SOL'Í-PÉD, n. [solus and pes, L.] An animal having a single hoof on each foot; a solidungulate. SOL' The last syllable of the following class of words is derived from the Latin word pes, foot: — vir, biped, quadruped, conduped, milleped, multiped, palimped, plumiped, quadriped, and soliped; and it would seem proper that the final syllable in each should be spelled and pronounced in the same manner. The last syllable of biped and quadriped is uniformly written ped, without a final e. With regard to the others, usage is divided, though the final syllable of most of them has been heretofore more commonly written pede, with a final e; and it is pronounced by some orthoepists long, and by others short. There is no good reason for this diversity, and the best, and, perhaps, only practicable mode of establishing uniformity, is to spell them all without a final e, and pronounce the final syllable, ped, short.

of the black art themselves, against me in the pronunciation of this word, I have ventured to prefer the regular pronunciation to the irregular. The adjective sooty has its regular sound among the correctest speakers, which has induced Mr. Sheridan to mark it so; but nothing can be more absurd than to pronounce the substantive in one manner, and the adjective, derived from it by adding y, in another. The other orthoepists, therefore, who pronounce both these words with the o like ü, are more consistent than Mr. Sheridan, though upon the whole, not so right." Walker.

SOOTHE, (sòth) v. a. [i. soother; pp. soothing, soothed.]

To allay; to compose; to assuage; to tranquillize; to calm; to soften; to mollify; to gratify; to pacify; to mitigate; to appease. SOP' TH, at the end of words, is sharp, as death, breath, &c., except in denath, boots, with, and the verbs to sooth, to smooth, to sooth, to mouth, all which ought to be written with s final, not only to distinguish some of them from the nouns, but to show that th is soft; for th, when final, is sometimes pronounced soft, as in mouth; yet th, at the end of words, is never pronounced hard. There is an obvious analogy for this sound of th in these verbs, as for the s sound of s in verbs ending in ss; and why we should write some verbs with s, and others without it, is inconceivable. The best way to show the absurdity of our orthography, in this particular, will be to draw out the nouns and verbs as they stand in Johnson's Dictionary: —

Nouns, &c.	Verbs.	Nouns, &c.	Verbs.
Bath, " bath;	Sheath, " to sheath, sheathe;	Breath, " breathe;	Smooth, " smooth;
Cloth, " clothe;	Sooth, " sooth;	" uncloth;	Swath, " swath;
Loath, " loathe;	" wreath;	Mouth, " mouth;	" inwreath.

"Surely nothing can be more evident than the analogy of the language in this case. Is it not absurd to hesitate a moment at writing all the verbs with s final. This is a departure from our great lexicographer which he himself would approve, as nothing but inadvertency could have led him into this unmeaning irregularity." Walker.

Although Walker speaks so decidedly on this matter, yet he has not accommodated the orthography of all these words to the principle which he inculcates. It could be wished that all the words of this class were conformed in their orthography to this rule. The only ones which are not now actually, by respectable usage, conformed to it, are the verbs to mouth and to smooth, which we hardly ever see written to mouth and to smooth.

“Mr. Sheridan is the only orthoëpist who has accented this word on the first syllable, as I have done; for Dr. Johnson, Dr. Ash, Dr. Kenrick, Barclay, Fenning, Bailey, and Entick, accent the second. Its companion, dansitory, is accented on the first syllable by Mr. Sheridan, Dr. Johnson, Mr. Nares, Mr. Smith, and Fenning, [and by J. F. E. Ja. K. Sm. R. Wb.]; but on the second by Dr. Ash, Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Scott, W. Johnston, Mr. Perry, Buchanan, Bailey, and Entick. As these two words must necessarily be accented alike, we see Dr. Johnson and Fenning [also J. K. Sm. R. Wb.] are inconsistent. But, though the majority of authorities are against me in both these words, I greatly mistake if auleogy is not clearly on my side.” Walker.

SUB-TILE, (süb'til) a. Sly; artful; cunning; crafty; wily; acute. “Subtily and subtle are often confounded with each other both in orthography and pronunciation, and also in the sense of acute; as, a “subtle reasoner,” or a “subtily reasoner.”

“This word and subtle have been used almost indiscriminately to express very different senses, as may be seen in Johnson; but, as custom has adopted a different spelling and a different pronunciation, it is to be presumed it has not been without reason. That the first sense of the word, meaning fine, acute, &c., should extend itself to the latter, meaning sly, artful, &c., is not to be wondered at, as words have a tendency to fall into a bad sense; witness knave, villain, &c.; but, if custom has marked this difference of sense by a difference of spelling and pronunciation, it should seem to be an effort of nature to preserve precision in our ideas. If these observations are just, the abstracts of these words ought to be kept as distinct as their concretes: from subtily ought to be formed subtily, and from subtle, subtlety; the b being heard in the two first, and mute in the two last.” Walker.

SUB-TILE-NESS,* (süb'til-nés) n. Quality of being subtle. Smart.

[Fr.; successio, L.] Act of succeeding, or of following in order; that which follows or succeeds; consecution; a series of things or persons following one another in order; a lineage; an order of descendants; power or right of succeeding. — Apollonius succession, (Theol.) “The uninterrupted succession of priests in the church, by regular ordination, from the first commission given by Christ to the apostles, and recorded in the Gospels, down to the present day. And the doctrine of ‘the apostolical succession,’ as it is properly called, means the belief that the clergy, so regularly ordained, have a commission from God to preach the gospel, administer the sacraments, and guide the church; that through their ministrations only we can derive the grace which is communicated by the sacraments. It follows, of course, that those sects of Christians which have no succession (having seceded from Romanism without retaining ministers regularly ordained, or having subsequently interrupted the succession, that is, all Protestant bodies, except the church of England) have, properly speaking, neither church nor sacraments, since they possess no apostolical authority. . . . The church of England does not affirm this doctrine in her Articles; and the language of Art. 19, although not excluding it, is plainly not such as would have been used by frasers who wished to inculcate it." Brande. — Law of succession, (Law) the law or rule according to which the succession to the property of deceased individuals is regulated.

☞ "This word is not unfrequently pronounced with the accent on the second syllable, as if it were formed from success; but this accentuation, though agreeable to its Latin original, has, as in confessor, yielded to the prevailing power of the English antepenultimate accent. Dr. Johnson, Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Elphinstone, and Eatock accent this word on the first syllable; and Dr. Ash, Dr. Kenrick, W. Johnston, Mr. Perry, Buchanan, and Bailey, on the second; Barclay and Fanning give both, but prefer the first; Mr. Scott gives both, and prefers the second; but, from the opinion that is foolishly gone forth, that we ought to accent words as near the beginning as possible, there is little doubt that the antepenultimate accent will prevail." Walker. — "This is one of the words over which fashion now relaxes its sway in favor of the more consistent accentuation," [suk-sés'or.] Smart.

Scy "The quantity of e, in the first syllable of this word, and its relatives tenet, tenor, and tenure, is one of the most puzzling difficulties of pronunciation. How dif-

Recently this letter is pronounced by different speakers, may be gathered from a view of those orthoepists who have marked the quantity of the vowels:—

Sheridan,	ténable,	ténet,	ténor,	ténure.
Kerick,	ténable,	ténet,	ténor,	ténure.
Nares,	ténable,	ténet,	ténor,	ténure.

W. Johnston,	ténable,	ténet,	ténor,	ténure.
Buchanan,	ténable,	ténet,	ténor,	ténure.
Fry,	ténable,	ténet,	ténor,	ténure.
Smith,	ténable,	ténet,	ténor,	ténure.
Elphinston,	—	—	ténor,	—

“From this survey of our dictionaries, we find them uniform only in the word tenor. They are nearly equally divided on the word tenet; and, if similitude were to decide, it would be clearly in favor of the short vowel, in this word as well as in tenor. They are both Latin words, and both have the vowel short in the original. This, however, is no reason, with those who understand the analogy of English pronunciation, (for tremor, minor, &c., have the first vowel short in Latin,) but it sufficiently shows the partiality of the ear to the short vowel in words of this form, as is evident in the word tenant.” Walker.

The following table exhibits a view of the pronunciation of tenable, tenet, and tenure, by the principal English orthoepists subsequent to Walker:—

† The following derivatives of travél, viz., travelléd, travelling, and traveller, are here given with the l doubled, as they are found in most English dictionaries, and in accordance, also, with the prevailing usage. Some, however, spell these words with a single l, thus, traveled, travelling, traveller. This form is agreeable to the general analogy of the language; and it only wants the sanction of the prevailing usage to render it the preferable orthography.—These remarks are equally applicable to the derivatives of a number of other verbs ending in l; as, amél, drivél, empanél, gravel, grovel, level, marcel, model, &c.

TRÍPH'THÓNG, (tríp'thóng) [tríp'thóng, S. W. P. J. F. Ja. Sm. R.; trí'thóng, K.] n. [τρεῖς and φθγγή.] A coalition of three vowels in one syllable or sound; a trigraph; as, eau, eye. — Two aspirations in succession, says Mr. Elphinstone, seem disagreeable to an English ear, and therefore one of them is generally sunk. Thus diphthong and triphthong are pronounced diphthong and triphthong, because the t, which is akin to the aspiration, immediately precedes. Mr. Sheridan pronounces the first syllable of epithet like ep, but the first of diphthong and triphthong like di and tri. Mr. Scott, W. Johnston, and Mr. Perry, pronounce diphthong and triphthong in the same manner as Mr. Sheridan. Dr. Kenrick gives no pronunciation to diphthong, but makes the h silent in triphthong; while Barclay pronounces the h in epithet, but makes it either way in diphthong and silent in triphthong. It may be remarked, that Dr. Jones, who wrote a spelling dictionary in Queen Anne's time, makes the h in those two words silent." Walker.

U.

U, the twenty-first letter of the English alphabet, and the fifth vowel, has heretofore, in most English dictionaries, been confounded with the consonant u, as i has been with j; though the sounds and uses of the two letters are widely different. One and the same character, V was formerly used for both letters; and the character U is of modern introduction. The two principal sounds of u are the long, as in two, and the short, as in two. — It is used as an abbreviation; as, U. S., for United States; U. C. 752, urbis condita [anno] 752, "in the 752d year from the building of the city."

UN, A Saxon prefix, equivalent in meaning to the privative a of the Greeks, and the privative in of the Latins. It is placed, at will, before adjectives and adverbs, and before perfect participles of active verbs, to form adjectives; and also before many present participles, and a considerable number of verbs and nouns.

When prefixed to adjectives, participles, and adverbs,

It is uniformly interposed by not; in substantives, by the want or absence of; and in verbs, it almost always signifies the reversing or annulling of the action or state expressed by the verb. Nearly or quite all the words compounded with un that are often met with, are here inserted. But some which are, or may be, legitimately formed, are doubtless omitted.—Un and in are in some cases used indifferently; as, unavailable or inavailable. See IN.

[T] "This word is perfectly Anglicized, and therefore ought to have its last syllable pronounced according to English analogy, like centre, septre, maître, &c. There is a common mistake in the use of the Latin word from which this is derived, which it may not be improper to rectify. Vertebra is not unfrequently used to signify the whole collection of joints which form the backbone, while in reality it means only one of those joints: the plural is vertebræ, and this ought to be used for the whole spine, if we denominate it by a Latin word; but if we speak English, it ought to be vertebras, and pronounced as if written vertebræ." Walker.

 Dr. Hill published, in a pamphlet, a petition from the letters I and U to David Garrick, Esq., both complaining of terrible grievances imposed upon them by that great actor, who frequently banished them from their proper stations, as in the word virtus, which, they said, he converted into virtus; and in the word ungrateful, he displaced the u, and made it ungrateful, to the great prejudice of the said letters. To this complaint Garrick replied in the following epigram:
 "If it is, as you say, that I've injured a letter,
 I'll change my note soon, and, I hope, for the better
 May the right use of letters, as well as of men,
 Hereafter be fixed by the tongue and the pen.
 Most devoutly I wish they may both have their due,
 And that I may be never mistaken for U!" Walker.

Mr. Sheridan tells us that Swift used to jeer those who pronounced wind with the i short, by saying, 'I have a great wind to find why you pronounce it wind.' A very liberal critic retorted this upon Mr. Sheridan by saying, 'If I may be so bold, I should be glad to be toold why you pronounce it goold.' . . . Mr. Sheridan and Mr. Scott give the same preference to the first sound of this word that I have done. Dr. Kenrick and Mr. Barclay give only the short sound. Mr. Perry joins them in this sound, but says in dramatic scenes it has the long one. Mr. Nares says it has certainly the short sound in common usage, but that all our best poets rhyme it with wind, kind, &c.; and Mr. Smith observes, that it is now the polite pronunciation, though against analogy." Walker.

Barrow.—"Sometimes it lieth in pat allusion to a known story, or in reasonable application of a trivial saying, or in forging an apposite tale; sometimes it playeth in words and phrases, taking advantage from the ambiguity of their sense, or the affinity of their sound; sometimes it is wrapped up in a dress of humorous expression; sometimes it lurketh under an odd similitude; sometimes it is lodged in a sly question, in a smart answer, in a quirkish reason, in a shrewd intimation, in cunningly diverting or cleverly retorting an objection; sometimes it is couched in a bold scheme of speech, in a tart irony, in a lusty hyperbole, in a startling metaphor, in a plausible reconciling of contradictions, or in acute nonsense; sometimes a scencial representation of persons or things, a counterfeit speech, a mimical look or gesture, passeth for it; sometimes an affected simplicity, sometimes a presumptuous bluntness, giveth it being; sometimes it riseth only from a lucky hitting upon what is strange; sometimes from a crafty wresting obvious matter to the purpose. Often it consisteth in one knows not what, and springeth up one can hardly tell how. Its ways are unaccountable and inexplicable, being answerable to the numberless roivings of fancy and windings of language."

WROTHLY, (wür'th-le) v. a. To render worthy; to exalt. Skak.

WROTHLY, (wür'th-le) v. a. & n. To know; to be aware. Spenser.—It is also the preterit of the obsolete verb wrot; and is used by old authors both in the present and imperfect tenses. See WRET.

WROTE, v. Same as wot. See WOT, and WRET.

WROULD, (würd) v. auxiliary and defective; implying inclination, wish, or desire. It is regarded as the preterit of will, and is used to form the past tense of the potential mood; but it is likewise used in the conditional present tense. "He would have paid the bill yesterday, if he had been able." "He would say it now, if he could." In the former instance, would is used in the past tense; and in the latter, in the conditional present.

Would is used in a particular manner to express a wish or prayer, as in the phrases would God, would to God, would to Heaven, or simply would; as, "Would God I had died for thee, O Absalom." 2 Sam. "Would to God you could bear with me." 2 Cor. "Would to Heaven." Dryden. "Would thou hadst hearkened to my words." Milton. "Would that they would take one side or the other." Dr. Thomas Arnold.

The following remarks are quoted from Dr. Johnson.—"Would has the signification of I wish, or I pray. This, I believe, is improper, and formed by a gradual corruption of the phrase would God: which originally imported, that God would, might God will, might God decree. From this phrase, ill understood, came "would to God;" thence "I would to God;" and thence I would, or, elliptically, would, came to signify I wish:—and it is used even by good authors, but ought not to be imitated."

WOULD'ING-NESS, (wür'd'ing-nés) n. Willingness. Hammond.

WOUND, (wönd or wöünd) [wönd or wöünd, W. P. J. Cobbin; wönd, S. Ja. K. Sm. R. Scott; wöünd, E. Wb. Neres, Kenrick.] n. A hurt given to the body or animal frame by violence; an injury; a cut; a slash; laceration.

WOUND, (wönd or wöünd) [wönd or wöünd, W. P. J. Cobbin; wönd, S. Ja. K. Sm. R. Scott; wöünd, E. Wb. Neres, Kenrick.] n. A hurt given to the body or animal frame by violence; an injury; a cut; a slash; laceration. "The first pronunciation of this word, [wöünd], which generally received among the polite world, is certainly a capricious novelty,—a novelty either generated by false criticism, to distinguish it from the preterit of the verb to wind, of which there was not the least danger of interference, or more probably from an affectation of the French sound of this diphthong, which, as in pour, and some other words, we find of late to have prevailed. The stage is in possession of this sound, and what Swift observes of newspapers, with respect to the introduction of new and fantastical words, may be applied to the stage, with respect to new and fantastical modes of pronunciation. That the other pronunciation was the established sound of the word, appears from the poets, who rhyme it with bound, found, ground, and around; and it is still so among the great bulk of speakers, who learn this sound at school, and are obliged to unlearn it again when they come into the conversation of the polite world. Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, and Mr. Elphinston, adopt the first sound of this word; but Dr. Kenrick and W. Johnston the second: Mr. Perry gives both, but prefers the first; and though Mr. Smith, in his Vocabulary, has classed it with wound and found, he says wound is the common pronunciation. I am, however, of Mr. Neres's opinion, who says this pronunciation ought to be entirely banished. But where is the man bold enough to risk the imputation of vulgarity by such an expulsion?" Walker.—Smart styles wöünd "the old-fashioned, pronunciation."

A.; y \acute{e} or y \acute{e} , F.] ad. Yes:—a particle of affirmation, convertible to no;—a particle by which the sense is intended or enforced; not only so, but more than so. \S The word is antiquated, being now rarely used except in the solemn style.

\S "Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, W. Johnston, Mr. Smith and Mr. Fry, pronounce this word so as to rhyme with may, pay, &c.; but Steele or Brightland, Dr. Jones, who wrote the 'New Art of Spelling,' in Queen Anne's time, Dr. Kenrick, and Mr. Perry, pronounce it like the pronoun ye. Though so many are against me, I do not hesitate to pronounce the latter mode the best; first, as it is more agreeable to the general sound of the diphthong; next, as it is more related to its familiar substitute ye; and, lastly, unless my memory greatly fails me, because it is always so pronounced when contrasted with may; as in that precept of the gospel, 'Let your communication be ye, ye, and no, no.'" Walker.

Most of the orthoepists more recent than Walker pronounce this word ye.

Y \acute{E} LL, v. a. To utter with a yell. Shak.

Y \acute{E} LL, n. A hideous outcry; a cry of horror; a scream.

Y \acute{E} L \acute{L} OW, (y \acute{e} l'lo) [y \acute{e} l'lo, W. P. J. F. Ja. K. Sm. R.; y \acute{e} l'lo, S. Nares, Scott.] a. Being of a bright, golden color.

\S "Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Nares, Mr. Scott, Dr. Jones, and Mr. Fry, pronounce this word as if written y \acute{e} ll \acute{o} , rhyming with tallow. But Dr. Kenrick, W. Johnson, Mr.

Smith, and Mr. Perry, preserve the e in its pure sound, and rhyme the word with melior. The latter mode is, in my opinion, clearly the best, both as more agreeable to analogy and the best usage; for I am much deceived if the former pronunciation do not border closely on the vulgar." Walker.

YEO'MAN, (yó'mán) [yó'mán, W. P. J. E. F. Ja. K. Sm. R. W. b.; yém'mán, S. Scott, Smith, Barclay; yüm'mun, Kenrick.] n.; pl. YEO'MEN, (yó'mén) A man of a small estate in land; a farmer; a gentleman farmer: — an upper servant in a nobleman's family: — an officer in the king of England's household: — a title of certain inferior military attendants, or foot-guards, called yeomen of the guard. — (Vest.) A seaman appointed to certain duties, as to attend to the store-rooms.

“Junius gives us a great variety of derivations of this word, but seems most to approve of that from gæman, in the old Frisic, signifying a countryman or villager; and this word is derived further, by Junius, from the Greek γαῖα, γαῖν, γῆ, which, he tells us, does not only signify the earth in general, but any great portion of land. Skinner says it may be derived from the Anglo-Saxon gæmana, or the Teutonic gæman, a common man, or one of the commonalty; or from gæwman, a shepherd; from gæwman, an appellation given to inferior people; from gæwman, a companion; from gæwman, a young man; from gæwman, an ordinary man, or any body, like the Spanish hidalgo; and he prefers its derivation from the Anglo-Saxon gæma, a painful or laborious man.

“But, however widely etymologists are divided in the derivation of this word, orthoepists are not less different in their pronunciation of it. Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, Mr. Coote, (author of the ‘Elements of Grammar,’) Steele’s Grammar, (published in Queen Anne’s time,) Mr. Barclay, Mr. Smith, and Buchanan, pronounce it with the diphthong short, as if written yémman; Dr. Kenrick pronounces it as if written yémman; Mr. Elphinston (who quotes Langham, the famous reformer of orthography in Queen Elizabeth’s time, for the same pronunciation) sounds the e like e; and Dr. Jones, the author of the ‘New Art of Spelling,’ in Queen Anne’s time, pronounces it in the same manner; to which we may add Ben Jonson, who says that yeoman, people, and jeopardy, were truer written yéman, yéple, yépardy. But W. Johnston, Mr. Perry, Entick, and Fry, pronounce the e like long, open e, as if written yémman; and this last appears to me to be the most received pronunciation. It is that which we constantly hear applied to the king’s body-guard, and it is that which has always been the pronunciation on the stage, — an authority which, in this case, may not, perhaps, improperly be called the best echo of the public voice. I well remember hearing Mr. Garrick pronounce the word in this manner, in a speech in King Lear: ‘Tell me, fellow, is a madman a gentleman or a yoman?’” Walker.

YEO'MAN-LY, a. Of or belonging to a yeoman. B. Jonson.
YEO'MAN-RY, n. The collective body of yeomen; the collective body of farmers; husbandmen.

YERK, (yérk, S. W. P. E. K. Sm.; yérk or yérk, Ja.) v. a. (l. yerked; pp. yerking, yerked.) To throw out or move with a spring; to jerk. Shak. To lash; to strike; to beat. Spenser. [R.]

YÈS, (yès, P. E. Ja. Sm. R.; yis, S. W. J.; yès or yis, F. K.) ad. A term of affirmation; the affirmative particle, opposed to no; yea. — It is, like yea, a word of enforcement; even so; not only so, but more.

“This word is worn into a somewhat slenderer sound than what is authorized by the orthography; but e and i are frequently interchangeable, and few changes can be better established than this. W. Johnston and Mr. Perry are the only orthoepists, who give the sound of the vowels, that do not mark this change; but Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Nares, Mr. Smith, and Dr. Jones, in his ‘New Art of Spelling,’ confirm this change, and rhyme it with hies, mies, blies, &c.” Walker. “It is not probable that a polite speaker would, at this day, even on Mr. Walker’s authority, pronounce the word yis, yis.” Jamieson.

YÈS-A-WÍLL, v. n. A state messenger in India. Crabb.
YÈST, (yést, S. W. F. Ja.; yést or yést, P. J.; yést, K. Sm. Nares.) n. Barm; spume; foam; froth; yeast. — Now commonly written and pronounced yeast. See YEAST.

YÈS'TÈR, a. [gestern, gestern, Sax.; hesternus, L.; hestern, old Engl.] That was next before the present day. — It is not often used but in composition with day or night.

“Though yea, from its continual use, is allowably worn into the somewhat easier sound of yis, there is no reason why yesterday should adopt the same change; and, though I cannot pronounce this change vulgar, since Mr. Sheridan, Dr. Kenrick, Mr. Nares, and Mr. Scott, have adopted it, I do not hesitate to pronounce the regular sound, given by W. Johnston, as the more correct and agreeable to the best usage.” Walker. [Bacon.
YÈS'TÈR-DAY, or YÈS'TÈR-DAY, ad. On the day last past.
YÈS'TÈR-EVÈ, or YÈS'TÈR-E'VÈN-ING, v. n. The evening last past. Rowe.

YÈS'TÈR-NIGHT, (yès'tèr-nít) ad. On the night last past.

YÈS'TY, a. Frothy; yeasty. Shak. See YEASTY.

YÈT, (yét, S. W. P. J. E. F. Ja. E. Sm. R.; yét or yit, Kenrick.) conj. Nevertheless; notwithstanding; however.

“The e in this word is frequently changed by incorrect speakers into i; but, though this change is agreeable to the best and most established usage in the word yea, in yèt it is the mark of incorrectness and vulgarity.

“Dr. Kenrick is the only orthoepist who gives an countenance to this incorrectness, by admitting it as a second pronunciation; but Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Scott, W. Johnston, Mr. Perry, and Mr. Smith, give the regular sound only.” Walker.

YÈT, ad. Beside; over and above; still; once again; at this time; so soon; hitherto; thus far; at least; in a new degree; even; as given; al; hitherto, sometimes with as before it.

YÖU, (yü, when emphatical; yu, when otherwise,) (yü, s. W. J. Ja. K.; yü or yu, Sm.; yü, P.] pron. personal, pl. of Thou. [Nominative tu or tou; possessive tuus; objective tu.] The person or persons spoken to. It is commonly used when a single individual is addressed, instead of thou or thee; but properly with a plural construction; as, "you were;" instead of "thou wast." By—"In the sentence, 'Though he told you, he had no right to tell you,' the pronoun you, having no distinctive emphasis, invariably falls into the sound of the antiquated form of this pronoun, ya." Walker.

YÖUNG, (yüng) a. Being in the first or early part of life, as opposed to old:—used of animal, and also of vegetable, life:—not old; youthful; inexperienced.

YÖUR, (yür, when emphatical; yur, when otherwise,) (yür, s. W. P. F. Ja. K.; yör or yür, J. Sm.) pron. possessive or adjective. Belonging to you.—Your and yours are the possessive forms of you. Your is used when the thing possessed follows; as, "your book;" otherwise yours. as, "This book is yours."

By—"This word is nearly under the same predicament as the pronoun my. When the emphasis is upon this word, it is always pronounced full and open, like the noun myer; as, 'The moment I had read your letter, I sat down to write mine;' but when it is not emphatical, it generally sinks into yur, exactly like the last syllable of less-yer; as, 'I had just answered your first letter, as your last arrived.' Here, if we were to say, 'I had just answered your first letter as your last arrived,' with your sounded full and open like myer, as in the former sentence, every delicate ear would be offended. The obscure sound of the possessive pronoun your always takes place when it is used to signify any species of persons or things in an indeterminate sense. Thus, Addison, speaking of those metaphors which professional men most commonly fall into, says, 'Your men of business usually have recourse to such instances as are too mean and familiar.' The pronunciation of your, in yourself, is a confirmation of these observations." Walker.

YÖUR-SELV', (yür-selv') (yür-selv', W. J. Ja. Sm.; yür-selv', P. F.] pron. You; even you; and the reciprocal form of you, when used for thou or thee.—Yourselves, (yür-selvz') the reciprocal form of you strictly used in the plural; as, "You saw it yourselves;" (when one is addressed); "You saw it yourselves;" (when several are addressed).

ZEAL'LESS, (zēl'les) a. Wanting zeal. Hammond.

ZEAL'OT, (zēl'ot, S. P. J. F. Ja. K. Sm. R.; zēl'ot or zēl'ut, W. Kenrick.) n. [zēlotar, Fr.; ζῆλωτής, Gr.] One affected or carried away by zeal; an enthusiast; one over zealous: — generally used in disparage.

Zeal. "There are few words better confirmed by authority in their departure from the sound of their simples than this and zealous. Dr. Kenrick gives both sounds to both words, but prefers the short sound by placing it first; but Mr. Elphinston, Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Nares, Mr. Smith, Mr. Perry, Barclay, and Entick, give both these words the short sound. As the word zealous may either come from the Latin zelus, or rather zelosus, or be a formative of our own from zeal, as villanous, libellous, &c., from villain, libel, &c., analogy might very allowably be pleaded for the long sound of the diphthong; and, if custom were less decided, I should certainly give my vote for it; but, as propriety of pronunciation may be called a compound ratio of usage and analogy, the short sound must, in this case, be called the proper one." Walker.

ZEAL'OT'-CHAL, a. Perniciously zealous. Strype.

ZEAL'OT'-ISM,* n. The character or conduct of a zealot. E. Rev.

Zeal. "I never once called in doubt the pronunciation of this word, till I was told that mathematicians generally make the first syllable short. Upon consulting our orthoepists, I find all who have the word, and who give the quantity of the vowels, make the e long, except Entick. Thus Sheridan, Kenrick, Scott, Buchanan, W. Johnston, and Perry, pronounce it long; and if this majority were not so great and so respectable, the analogy of words of this form ought to decide." Walker.

THE EDITOR'S PREFACE.

THE following pages contain the whole of Walker's "Key to the Classical Pronunciation of Greek, Latin, and Scripture Proper Names," together with his "Introduction," "Rules," and "Notes," and also his "Observations on the Greek and Latin Accent and Quantity." To the Greek and Latin names inserted by Walker in his Key, have been here added, by the Editor, about 3,000 other Greek and Latin names. Of these additional names, about 2,400 have been taken from the "Classical Pronunciation of Proper Names, established by Citations from the Greek and Latin Poets, Greek Historians, Geographers, and Scholiasts," by Thomas Swinburne Carr, of King's College, London; between 500 and 600 are words which were added by the Rev. W. Trollope, A. M., one of the Masters of Christ's Hospital, London, in his edition of Walker's Key; and some have also been inserted, which were taken from Scheller's "Latin and German Lexicon."

The words standing in the Initial Vocabulary without a letter annexed to them, are words found in Walker's Key; and they are inserted with his pronunciation, the notation added to them being in general accordance with his principles. It is the same notation that is used in the preceding Dictionary. The words to which (C.) (T.) or (S.) are annexed, are taken respectively from Carr, Trollope, and Scheller.

There is a considerable number of the Greek and Latin names, in the pronunciation of which Carr differs from Walker. These names are repeated in the Initial Vocabulary, the pronunciation of Carr following that of Walker, having the letter (C.) annexed to it. In the pronunciation of a considerable number of words, Walker is influenced by English analogy and usage; but Carr adheres rigidly to classical authority, and has no regard to English analogy or English usage; and with respect to the pronunciation of the words which they pronounce differently, that of Carr is almost always better supported by classical authority, than that of Walker. Carr says of his work, — "The object of it is to determine the pronunciation of classical proper names solely on the basis of classical authority, — including, of course, metrical quotations, orthography, and etymology. As it was the object of the author to establish the classical pronunciation of proper names, it was a matter of very secondary importance as to whether the accentuation of any particular name, if based upon classical authority, might coincide or not with that adopted by popular usage. It did not fall within the limits of his task 'to consult the English ear,' or to recognize the 'analogy of the English language,' as in the slightest degree competent to establish the pronunciation of dead languages, which can only be recovered from a perusal of their literary monuments now existing."

The few critical notes inserted by Mr. Trollope, in his edition of Walker's Key, in some of which he combats Walker's principles, are inserted in their proper places; and the Editor has also added a very few notes of his own. Though some obvious errors, mostly typographical, in Walker's Key, have been corrected, yet the course pursued has been to allow Walker's pronunciation to stand as he intended it should. His decisions, however, are in many instances combated by other authorities.

The words added to the Initial Vocabulary of this edition of the Key, are not inserted in the Terminational Vocabulary. Walker inserted many words in the Terminational Vocabulary which he did not introduce into the Initial Vocabulary; and some words found in both are pronounced differently in the two Vocabularies. Some palpable inconsistencies and errors have been corrected; yet the Terminational Vocabulary remains, for the most part, as Walker left it.

The pronunciation of but a small part of the Scripture Proper Names can be determined by classical authority; and they are, therefore, much more subjected to the English analogy, than the Greek and Latin names. The pronunciation of most of these names, as given by Walker, is in accordance with general usage. There is, however, a considerable number of them respecting the pronunciation of which other respectable orthoëpists differ from him. These names stand in the Initial Vocabulary with Walker's pronunciation placed first, followed by the deviations from him of the following orthoëpists; namely, Oliver, Perry, Smart, Carr, and also Taylor, the editor of Calmet's "Dictionary of the Bible." In some cases, the deviations are, doubtless, to be preferred to Walker's mode.

The great addition now made to the vocabulary of Greek and Latin names in this work, and the exhibition of the authorities of other orthoëpists in relation to many of the Greek, Latin, and Scripture proper names, with regard to which the pronunciation of Walker is combated, will give this edition of his "Key" advantages over any other that has yet been published.

CAMBRIDGE, July, 1846.

PREFACE.

THE "Critical Pronouncing Dictionary of the English Language" naturally suggested an idea of the present work. Proper names from the Greek and Latin form so considerable a part of every cultivated living language, that a dictionary seems to be imperfect without them. Polite scholars, indeed, are seldom at a loss for the pronunciation of words they so frequently meet with in the learned languages; but there are great numbers of respectable English scholars, who, having only a tincture of classical learning, are much at a loss for a knowledge of this part of it. It is not only the learned professions that require this knowledge, but almost every one above the merely mechanical. The professors of painting, statuary, and music, and those who admire their works; readers of history, politics, poetry; all who converse on subjects ever so little above the vulgar,—have so frequent occasion to pronounce these proper names, that whatever tends to render this pronunciation easy must necessarily be acceptable to the public.

The proper names in Scripture have still a higher claim to our attention. That every thing contained in that precious repository of divine truth should be rendered as easy as possible to the reader, cannot be doubted; and the very frequent occasions of pronouncing Scripture proper names, in a country where reading the Scripture makes part of the religious worship, seem to demand some work on this subject more perfect than any we have hitherto seen.

I could have wished it had been undertaken by a person of more learning and leisure than myself; but we often wait in vain, for works of this kind, from those learned bodies which ought to produce them, and at last are obliged, for the best we can get, to the labors of some necessitous individual. Being long engaged in the instruction of youth, I felt the want of a work of this kind, and have supplied it in the best manner I am able. If I have been happy enough to be useful, or only so far useful as to induce some abler hand to undertake the subject, I shall think my labor amply rewarded. I shall still console myself with reflecting, that he who has produced a prior work, however inferior to those that succeed it, is under a very different predicament from him who produces an after-work inferior to those that have gone before.

TO THE SECOND EDITION.

THE favorable reception of the first edition of this work has induced me to attempt to make it still more worthy of the acceptance of the public, by the addition of several critical observations, and particularly by two Terminational Vocabularies, of Greek and Latin, and Scripture, Proper Names. That so much labor should be bestowed upon an inverted arrangement of these words, when they had already been given in their common alphabetical order, may be matter of wonder to many persons, who will naturally inquire into the utility of such an arrangement. To these it may be answered, that the words of all languages seem more related to each other by their terminations than by their beginnings; that the Greek and Latin languages seem more particularly to be thus related; and classing them according to their endings seemed to exhibit a new view of these languages, both curious and useful; for, as their accent and quantity depend so much on their termination, such an arrangement appeared to give an easier and more comprehensive idea of their pronunciation, than the common classification by their initial syllables. This end was so desirable, as to induce me to spare no pains, however dry and disgusting, to promote it; and, if the method I have taken has failed, my labor will not be entirely lost, if it convinces future prosodists that it is not unworthy of their attention

INTRODUCTION.

THE pronunciation of the learned languages is much more easily acquired than that of our own. Whatever might have been the variety of the different dialects among the Greeks, and the different provinces of the Romans, their languages, now being dead, are generally pronounced according to the respective analogies of the several languages of Europe, where those languages are cultivated, without partaking of those anomalies to which the living languages are liable.

Whether one general uniform pronunciation of the ancient languages be an object of sufficient importance to induce the learned to depart from the analogy of their own language, and to study the ancient Latin and Greek pronunciation, as they do the etymology, syntax, and prosody of those languages, is a question not very easy to be decided. The question becomes still more difficult, when we consider the uncertainty we are in respecting the ancient pronunciation of the Greeks and Romans, and how much the learned are divided among themselves about it.* Till these points are settled, the English may well be allowed to follow their own pronunciation of Greek and Latin, as well as other nations, even though it should be confessed, that it seems to depart more from what we can gather of the ancient pronunciation, than either the Italian, French, or German.† For why the English should pay a compliment to the learned languages, which is not done by any other nation in Europe, it is not easy to conceive; and, as the colloquial communication of learned individuals of different nations so seldom happens, and is an object of so small importance when it does

* Middleton contends that the initial c before s and i ought to be pronounced as the Italians now pronounce it; and that Cicero is neither Sisero, as the French and English pronounce it, nor Kikero, as Dr. Bentley asserts; but Tchickero, as the Italians pronounce it at this day. This pronunciation, however, is derided by Lipsius, who affirms that the c among the Romans had always the sound of k. Lipsius says, too, that, of all the European nations, the British alone pronounce the i properly; but Middleton asserts, that, of all nations, they pronounce it the worst. — Middleton, De Lat. Liter. Pronun. Dissert.

Lipsius, speaking of the different pronunciation of the letter G in different countries, says:

“Nos hodiè quàm peccamus? Itolorum enim plerique ut Z exprimunt, Galli et Belgæ ut J consonantem. Itaque illorum est Lezere, Fuzere; nostrum, Leiere, Fuiere. (Lejere, Fyjere.) Omnia imperitè, ineptè. Germanos saltem audite, quorum sonus hic germanus, Legere, Tjgere; ut in Lago, Tjgo. Nec unquam variant: at nos ante I, E, JE, Y, semper; dicimusque Jemman, Jetulos, Jinjivam, Jyrum; pro litis, Gemmam, Getulos, Givjivam, Gyrum. Mutemus aut vapulemus.” — Lipsius, De Rect. Pron. Ling. Lat. p. 71.

“Hinc factum est ut tanta in pronunciando varietas extiteret, ut pauci inter se in literum sonis consentiant. Quod quidem mirum non esset, si indocti tantum a doctis in eo, ac non ipsi etiam aliqui eruditi inter se magnâ contentione, dissiderent. — Adolph. Meerk. De Ling. Græc. vet. Pronun. cap. li. p. 15.

† Monsieur Launecloz, the learned author of the Port-Royal Greek Grammar, in order to convey the sound of the long Greek vowel η, tells us it is a sound between the e and the a, and that Eustathius, who lived towards the close of the twelfth century, says βῆ, βῆ, λῆγω βαδίει made in imitation of the bleating of a sheep; and quotes to this purpose this verse of an ancient writer called Cratinus:

Ὅ δ' ἠλίθιος ὡστερ πρόβατον, βῆ, βῆ, λῆγω βαδίει
Is fatuus perinde ac ovīs, βῆ, βῆ, dicens, incodit.
He, like a silly sheep, goes crying bae.

Cambinus has remarked the same, Hellen. p. 96. “E longum, cuius sonus in ovium balatu sentitur, ut Cratinus et Varro tradiderunt.” “The sound of the e long may be perceived in the bleating of sheep, as Cratinus and Varro have handed down to us.”

Eustathius likewise remarks, upon the 499th v. of Iliad I., that the word Βλόψ ἔστιν ὁ τῆς κλεψύδρας ἤχος μιμητικῶς κατὰ τοὺς παλαιούς· βῆ ἔχει μίμησιν προβάτων φωνῆς. Κράτινος. “Βλόψ est Clepsydrae sonus, ex imitatione, secundum veteres; et βῆ imitatur vocem ovium.” “Blops, according to the ancients, is a sound in imitation of the Clepsydra, as bae is expressive of the voice of sheep.” It were to be wished that the sound of every Greek vowel had been conveyed to us by as faithful a testimony as the ἦρα; we should certainly have had a better idea of that harmony for which the Greek language was so famous, and in which respect Quintilian candidly yields it the preference to the Latin.

Aristophanes has handed down to us the pronunciation of the Greek diphthong αῦ, by making it expressive of the barking of a dog. This pronunciation is exactly like that preserved by nurses and children among us to this day in bow wow. This is the sound of the same letters in the Latin tongue; not only in proper names derived from Greek, but in every other word where this diphthong occurs. Most nations in Europe, perhaps all but the English, pronounce audio and laudo as if written ovodio and lowodio; the diphthong sounding like ou in loud. Agreeably to this rule, it is presumed that we formerly pronounced the apostle Paul nearer the original than at present. In Henry VIII.'s time it was written St. Poule's, and sermons were preached at Poule's Cross. The vulgar, generally the last to alter, either for the better or worse, still have a jingling proverb with this pronunciation, when they say, as old as Poule.

The sound of the letter u is no less sincerely preserved in Plautus, in Menæch. (p. 622, edit. Lambin.) in making use of it to imitate the cry of an owl:

“Man. Egon' dedi? Pan. Tu, tu, istic, inquam. Vin' afferri noctuam, Quæ 'Tu, Tu,' usque dicat tibi? nam nos jam nos defecisti sumus.”

“It appears here,” says Mr. Forster, in his defence of the Greek accents, (p. 129,) “that an owl's cry was tu, tu, to a Roman ear, as it is too, too, to an English.” Lambin, who was a Frenchman, observes, on the passage, “Alludit ad noctuæ vocem seu cantum, tu, tu, seu tow, tow.” “He here alludes to the voice or noise of an owl.” It may be further observed, that the English have totally departed from this sound of the u in their own language, as well as in their pronunciation of Latin.

happen, it is not much to be regretted, that, when they meet, they are scarcely intelligible to each other.*

But the English are accused not only of departing from the genuine sound of the Greek and Latin vowels, but of violating the quantity of these languages more than the people of any other nation in Europe. The author of the "Essay upon the Harmony of Language" gives us a detail of the particulars by which this accusation is proved; and this is so true a picture of the English pronunciation of Latin, that I shall quote it at length, as it may be of use to those who are obliged to learn this language without the aid of a teacher.

"The falsification of the harmony by English scholars, in their pronunciation of Latin, with regard to essential points, arises from two causes only; first, from a total inattention to the length of vowel sounds, making them long or short, merely as chance directs; and, secondly, from sounding double consonants as only one letter. The remedy of this last fault is obvious. With regard to the first, we have already observed, that each of our vowels hath its general long sound, and its general short sound, totally different. Thus the short sound of e lengthened is expressed by the letter a, and the short sound of i lengthened is expressed by the letter e; and, with all these anomalies usual in the application of vowel characters to the vowel sounds of our own language, we proceed to the application of vowel sounds to the vowel characters of the Latin. Thus, in the first syllable of sidus and nomen, which ought to be long, and of miser and onus, which ought to be short, we equally use the common long sound of the vowels; but, in the oblique cases, sideris, nomina, miseri, oneris, &c., we use quite another sound, and that a short one. These strange anomalies are not common to us with our southern neighbors, the French, Spaniards, and Italians. They pronounce sidus, according to our orthography, seedus, and, in the oblique cases, preserve the same long sound of the i. Nomen they pronounce as we do, and preserve, in the oblique cases, the same long sound of the o. The Italians also, in their own language, pronounce doubled consonants as distinctly as the two most discordant mutes of their alphabet. Whatever, therefore, they may want of expressing the true harmony of the Latin language, they certainly avoid the most glaring and absurd faults in our manner of pronouncing it.

"It is a matter of curiosity to observe with what regularity we use these solecisms in the pronunciation of Latin. When the penultimate is accented, its vowel, if followed but by a single consonant, is always long, as in Dr. Forster's examples. When the antepenultimate is accented, its vowel is, without any regard to the requisite quantity, pronounced short, as in mirabile, frigidus, except the vowel of the penultimate be followed by a vowel; and then the vowel of the antepenultimate is, with as little regard to true quantity, pronounced long, as in maneo, redcat, odium, imperium. Quantity is, however, vitiated to make i short, even in this case, as in oblivio, vinea, virium. The only difference we make in pronunciation between vinea and venia is, that to the vowel of the first syllable of the former, which ought to be long, we give a short sound; to that of the latter, which ought to be short, we give the same sound, but lengthened. U, accented, is always, before a single consonant, pronounced long, as in humerus, fugiens. Before two consonants no vowel sound is ever made long, except that of the diphthong au; so that, whenever a doubled consonant occurs, the preceding syllable is short.† Unaccented vowels we treat with no more ceremony in Latin than in our own language." — Essay upon the Harmony of Language, p. 224. Printed for Robson, 1774. [By William Mitford.]

This, it must be owned, is a very just state of the case; but, though the Latin quantity is thus violated, it is not, as this writer observes in the first part of the quotation, merely as chance directs, but, as he afterwards observes, regularly, and, he might have added, according to the analogy of English pronunciation, which, it may be observed, has a genius of its own, and which, if not so well adapted to the pronunciation of Greek and Latin as some other modern languages, has as fixed and settled rules for pronouncing them as any other.

The learned and ingenious author next proceeds to show the advantages of pronouncing our vowels so as to express the Latin quantity. "We have reason to suppose," says he, "that our usual accentuation of Latin, however it may want of many elegances in the pronunciation of the Augustan age, is yet sufficiently just to give, with tolerable accuracy, that part of the general har-

* "Erasmus se adfuisse olim commemorat, cum die quodam solenni complures principum legati ad Maximilianum Imperatorem salutandi causâ advenissent; singulosque Gallum, Germanum, Danum, Scotum, &c. orationem Latinam ita barbè ac vastè pronunsiassent, ut Italici quibusdam nihil nisi risum moverent, qui eos non Latinè sed sua quemque lingua, locutos jurassent." — Middleton, De Lat. Lit. Pronun.
The love of the marvellous prevails over truth; and I question if the greatest diversity in the pronunciation of Latin exceeds that of English at the capital and in some of the counties of Scotland; and yet the inhabitants of both have no great difficulty in understanding each other.

† This corruption of the true quantity is not, however, peculiar to the English; for Beza complains in his country: "Hinc enim fit ut in Græcâ oratione vel nullum, vel pressum corruptum numerum intelligas, dum multis brevibus prædicuntur, et contra plurimè longæ corripuntur." — Ess. & Germ. Pron. Græcæ Linguae, p. 50.

mony of the language, of which accent is the efficient. We have also pretty full information, from the poets, what syllables ought to have a long, and what a short quantity. To preserve, then, in our pronunciation, the true harmony of the language, we have only to take care to give the vowels a long sound or a short sound, as the quantity may require, and, when doubled consonants occur, to pronounce each distinctly." Ibid. p. 223.*

In answer to this plea for alteration, it may be observed, that, if this mode of pronouncing Latin be that of foreign nations, and were really so superior to our own, we certainly must perceive it in the pronunciation of foreigners, when we visit them, or they us. But I think I may appeal to the experience of every one who has had an opportunity of making the experiment, that, so far from the superiority on the side of the foreign pronunciation, it seems much inferior to our own. I am aware of the power of habit, and of its being able, on many occasions, to make the worse appear the better reason; but, if the harmony of the Latin language depended so much on a preservation of the quantity as many pretend, this harmony would surely overcome the bias we have to our own pronunciation, especially if our own were really so destructive of harmony as it is said to be. Till, therefore, we have a more accurate idea of the nature of quantity, and of that beauty and harmony of which it is said to be the efficient in the pronunciation of Latin, we ought to preserve a pronunciation which has naturally sprung up in our own soil, and is congenial to our native language. Besides, an alteration of this kind would be attended with so much dispute and uncertainty, as must make it highly impolitic to attempt it.

The analogy, then, of our own language being the rule for pronouncing the learned languages, we shall have little occasion for any other directions for the pronunciation of the Greek and Latin proper names, than such as are given for the pronunciation of English words. The general rules are followed almost without exception. The first and most obvious powers of the letters are adopted, and there is scarcely any difficulty but in the position of the accent; and this depends so much on the quantity of the vowels, that we need only inspect a dictionary to find the quantity of the penultimate vowel, and this determines the accent of all the Latin words; and, it may be added, of almost all Greek words likewise.† Now, in our pronunciation of Latin words, whatever be the quantity of the first syllable in a word of two syllables, we always place the accent on it; but in words of more syllables, if the penultimate be long, we place the accent on that; and if short, we accent the antepenultimate.

The rules of the Latin Accentuation are comprised, in a clear and concise manner, by Sanctus within four hexameters:

"Accentum in se ipsa monosyllaba dictio ponit.
 Exacuit sedem dissyllabon omne priorem.
 Ex tribus, extollit primam penultima curta:
 Extollit se ipsam quando est penultima longa."

These rules I have endeavored to express in English verse

Each monosyllable has stress of course:
 Words of two syllables the first enforce:
 A syllable that's long, and last but one,
 Must have the accent upon that or none;
 But, if this syllable be short, the stress
 Must on the last but two its force express.

The only difference that seems to obtain between the pronunciation of the Greek and Latin languages is, that, in the Latin, ti and si, preceded by an accent, and followed by another vowel forming an improper diphthong, are pronounced, as in English, like sh or zh; as, natio, nation; persuasio, persuasion, &c.; and that, in the Greek, the same letters retain their pure sound, as ἡλιονία, ἡλιονία, πρῶτον, &c. ‡ This difference, however, with very few exceptions, does not extend

* By what this learned author has observed of our vicious pronunciation of the vowels, by the long and short sound of them, and from the instances he has given, he must mean that length and shortness which arise from extending and contracting them, independently of the obstruction which two consonants are supposed to occasion in forming the long quantity. Thus we are to pronounce manus as if written and divided into man-nus; and pannus as if written pan-nus, or as we always hear the word paxis, (bread:); for in this sound of pannus there seems to be no necessity for pronouncing the two consonants distinctly, or separately, which he seems to mean by distinctly, because the quantity is shown by the long sound of the vowel; but if by distinctly he means separately, — that is, as if what is called in French the schéva, or mute e, were to follow the first consonant, — this could not be done without adding a syllable to the word; and the word pannus would in that case certainly have three syllables, as if written pan-eh-nus. — See Observations on the Greek and Latin Accent and Quantity, sect. 24.

† That is, in the general pronunciation of Greek; for, let the written accent be placed where it will, the quantitative accent, as it may be called, follows the analogy of the Latin.

‡ "The Greek language," says the learned critic, "was happy in not being understood by the Goths, who would as certainly have corrupted the t in aitia, ἄιτιος, &c., into aitia, ἄιτιος, &c., as they did in the Latin motio and doceo to proper names, which, coming to us through, and being mingled with, the Latins, fall into the general rule. In the same manner, though in Greek it was an established maxim, that, if the last syllable were long, the accent could scarcely be higher than the penultimate, yet, in our pronunciation of Greek, and particularly of proper names, the Latin analogy of the accent is adopted; and, though the last syllable is long in Demosthenes, Aristophanes, Thersameus, and Deiphobus, yet, as the penultimate is short, the accent is placed on the antepenultimate, exactly as if they were Latin.

As these languages have been long dead, they admit of no new varieties of accent, like the living languages. The common accentuation of Greek and Latin may be seen in Lexicons and Gradus; and where the ancients indulged a variety, and the moderns are divided in their opinions about the most classical accentuation of words, it would be highly improper, in a work intended for general use, to enter into the thorny disputes of the learned; and it may be truly said, in the rhyming adage,

"When doctors disagree, Disciples then are free."

This, however, has not been entirely neglected. Where there has been any considerable diversity of accentuation among our prosodists, I have consulted the best authorities, and have sometimes ventured to decide; though, as Labbe says, "Sed his de rebus, ut aliis multis, malo doctiorum judicium expectare, quam meam in medium proferre sententiam."

But the most important object of the present work is settling the English quantity, (see Rules 28, 21, 22,) with which we pronounce Greek and Latin proper names, and the sounds of some of the consonants. These are points in a state of great uncertainty, and are to be settled, not so much by a deep knowledge of the dead languages, as by a thorough acquaintance with the analogies and general usage of our own tongue. These must, in the nature of things, enter largely into the pronunciation of a dead language; and it is from an attention to these, that the author hopes he has given to the public a work not entirely unworthy of their acceptance.

[37] There is unquestionably much sound sense and solid argument in the remarks contained in our author's Introduction; and the affectation with which the Greek and Latin languages are sometimes pronounced is, to say the least, extremely ridiculous. At the same time, it would not be amiss to adopt some uniform mode of pronunciation, by which the true quantity of the words, and some portion, at least, of their ancient character, might be retained. The chief defect in the English pronunciation consists in the false analogy of the vowel sounds, and the corrupt inflection of the consonants c, g, s, t, before some of the vowels. This cannot, of course, be remedied, without departing, in some slight degree, from the general rules of our own language; but, if no sounds were introduced but those which are familiar to an English ear, though not perfectly in accordance with the usage of the English tongue, the trifling appearance of harshness or formality, which a closer approximation to the correct pronunciation might possess, would gradually wear away, and be amply compensated by its greater accuracy. Now, in order to attain this end, it will only be necessary to affix to each vowel its distinctive long and short quantity, and to confine the above-named consonants invariably to the same sound. The precise rules for pronouncing these letters will be given in their proper places; without interfering, however, with those of Mr. Walker, which, with the exception alluded to, are clear, correct, and explicit, and, for those who prefer to adhere to the English pronunciation, the best, without any exception, that can be adopted. — THOLLOPE.]

into moethio and doetho." * This, however, may be questioned; for if, in Latin words, this impure sound of t takes place only in those words where the accent is on the preceding vowel, as in ratio, facio, &c., but not when the accent follows the t, and is on the following vowel, as in satietas, societas, &c., why should we suppose any other mode of pronunciation would have been adopted by the Goths in their pronouncing the Greek? Now, no rule of pronunciation is more uniform, in the Greek language, than that which places an acute on the iota at the end of words, when this letter is succeeded by a long vowel; and consequently, if the accent be preserved upon the proper letter, it is impossible the preceding t and s should go into the sound of sk. Why, therefore, may we not suppose that the very frequent accentuation of the penultimate i before a final vowel preserved the preceding r from going into the sound of sk, as it was a difference of accentuation that occasioned this impure sound of t in the Latin language? For though i, at the end of words, when followed by a long vowel, or a vowel once long and afterwards contracted, had always the accent on it in Greek, in Latin the accent was always on the preceding syllable in words of this termination; and hence seems to have arisen the corruption of t in the Gothic pronunciation of the Latin language.

It is highly probable, that, in Lucian's time, the Greek r, when followed by i and another vowel, had not assumed the sound of σ; for the sigma would not have failed to accuse him of a usurpation of her powers, as he had done of her character; and, if we have preserved the r pure in this situation when we pronounce Greek, it is, perhaps, rather to be placed to the preserving power of the accented i in so great a number of words, than any adherence to the ancient rules of pronunciation, which invariably affirm that the consonants had but one sound; unless we except the y before r, x, ξ; as ἔργατος, ἔργατος, ἔργατος, &c., where the y is sounded like σ. But this, says Henry Stephens, is an error of the copyists, who have a little extended the bottom of the ρ, and made a y of it; for, say he, it is ridiculous to suppose that ρ was changed into σ, and at the same time that γ should be pronounced like σ. On the contrary, Scaliger says, that where we find a ρ before these letters, as ἔργατος, it is an error of the copyist, who imagined they better expressed the pronunciation by the letter, which, as Vossius observes, should seem to demand something particular and uncommon.

It is reported of Scaliger, that, when he was accused by a Scotchman in Latin, he begged his pardon for not understanding him, as he had never learned the Scotch language. If this were the case with the pronunciation of a Scotchman, which is so near that of the continent, what would he have said to the Latin pronunciation of an Englishman? I take it, however, that this diversity is greatly exaggerated.

† This, however, was contrary to the general practice of the Romans; for Victorinus, in his Grammar, says, "Grossa nomina, et iisdem literis profertur, (Latinè verò,) Grossa accentus habebunt: nam cum dicimus Thyrsus, Nix, scythia habebit posterior accentum; et cum Themiatio, Catypoo, Theaso, ultimam circumflecti videbimus, quod utrumque Latinus sermo non patitur, nisi admodum raro." "If Greek nouns turned into Latin are pronounced with the same letters, they have the Greek accent; for, when we say Thyrsus, Nix, the latter syllable has the acute accent; and when we pronounce Themiatio, Catypoo, Theaso, we see the last syllable is circumflexed; neither of which is ever seen in Latin words, or very rarely." — Servius. Florent. Aeph. p. 24. Notes 32, bott.

RULES

FOR PRONOUNCING THE VOWELS OF

GREEK AND LATIN PROPER NAMES.

1. EVERY vowel with the accent on it, at the end of a syllable, is pronounced, as in English, with its first long, open sound. Thus Ca'to,* Philome'la, Ori'on, Pho'cion, Lu'cifer, &c., have the accented vowels sounded exactly as in the English words pa'per, me'tre, spi'der, no'ble, tu'tor, &c.

2. Every accented vowel, not ending a syllable, but followed by a consonant, has the short sound, as in English. Thus Man'lius, Pen'theus, Pin'darus, Col'chis, Cur'tius, &c., have the short sound of the accented vowels, as in man'ner, plen'ty, prin'ter, collar, cur'few, &c.

3. Every final i, though unaccented, has the long, open sound. Thus the final i, forming the genitive case, as in magis'tri, or the plural number, as in De'ci, has the long, open sound, as in vi'al; and this sound we give to this vowel, in this situation, because the Latin i final, in genitives, plurals, and preterperfect tenses of verbs, is always long; and consequently, where the accented i is followed by i final, both are pronounced with the long diphthongal i, like the noun eye, as Achi'vi.†

4. Every unaccented i, ending a syllable not final, as that in the second of Alcibiades, the Hernici, &c., is pronounced like e, ‡ as if written Alcebiades, the Herneci, &c. So the last syllable but one of the Fabii, the Horatii, the Curii, &c., is pronounced as if written Fa-be-i, Ho-ra-she-i, Cu-re-a-she-i; § and there-fore, if the unaccented i, and the diphthong e, conclude a word, they are both pronounced like e, || as Harpyia, Har-py'i-e.

5. The diphthongs æ and æ, ending a syllable with the accent on it, are pronounced exactly like the long English e, as Cæsar, Cæta, &c., as if written Cee'sar, E'ta, &c.; and like the short e, when followed by a consonant in the same syllable, as Dædalus, Eddipus, &c., ¶ pronounced as if written Deddalus, Eddipus, &c. The vowels ei are generally pronounced like long i. For the vowels eu, in final syllables, see the word IDOMENEUS; and for the ou in the same syllables, see the word ANTINOUS, and similar words, in the Terminational Vocabulary.

6. Y is exactly under the same predicament as i. It is long when ending an accented syllable, as Cy'rus; or when ending an unaccented syllable, if final, as A'gy, A'py, &c.; short when joined to a consonant in the same syllable, as Lyc'idæ; and sometimes long and sometimes short when ending an initial syllable not under the accent, as Ly-cur'gus, pronounced with the first syllable like lie, a falsehood; and Lysimachus, with the first syllable like the first of legion, or nearly as if divided into Lys-im'a-chus, &c.

7. A, ending an unaccented syllable, has the same obscure sound as in the same situation in English words; but it is a sound bordering on the Italian a, or the a in fa-ther, as Dia'na, where the difference between the accented and unaccented a is palpable.

8. E final, either with or without the preceding

* This pronunciation of Cato, Plato, Cleopatra, &c., has been but lately adopted. Quin, and all the old dramatic school, used to pronounce the a, in these and similar words, like the a in father. Mr. Garrick, with great good sense, as well as good taste, brought in the present pronunciation, and the propriety of it has made it now universal.

† This is the true analogical pronunciation of this letter when ending an accented syllable; but a most disgraceful affectation of foreign pronunciation has exchanged this full diphthongal sound for the meagre, squeezed sound of the French and Italian i, not only in almost every word derived from those languages, but in many which are purely Latin; as, Faustina, Messalina, &c. Nay, words from the Saxon have been equally perverted, and we hear the i in Elfrida, Edwina, &c., turned into Elfrieda, Edwena, &c. It is true this is the sound the Romans gave to their i; [This is by no means certain.—TRULLOPE.] but the speakers here alluded to are perfectly innocent of this, and do not pronounce it in this manner for its antiquity, but its novelty.

‡ [This arises from the more rapid pronunciation of the vowel, which is short.—TRULLOPE.]

§ [See below on Rule 10.—TRULLOPE.]

|| [The i is rapidly pronounced, the voice resting upon the final diphthong.—TRULLOPE.]

¶ [This is certainly incorrect. Diphthongs are pronounced long wherever they occur; as, Dædalus, Eddipus, &c. The Latins doubtless distinguished between the sound of æ and æ, as the Greeks between the corresponding diphthongs ei and oi; but this difference cannot be readily accommodated to the English pronunciation.—TRULLOPE.]

[It may be said, that, in Greek and Latin poetry, diphthongs are always regarded as long; but it surely cannot be said, with truth, that in English they are always "pronounced long, wherever they occur." Various other ortho-epists adhere to the rule which Walker adopts in relation to the pronunciation of these diphthongs; and general usage, among good speakers, is in accordance with it. And this, not only in proper names: the diphthong in the word casafreda, for example, is pronounced like short e, both by the ortho-epists and by general usage.—EDDOR.]

 See Elegia, Egyptia, &c., in the Terminational Vocabulary of Greek and Latin Proper Names. [The statement of Walker, that "the vowels ei are generally pronounced like i long," is not in accordance with his remarks in his notes relating to the terminations æia and æia, in the Terminational Vocabulary. In these notes, he decides in favor of placing the accent on the e, and permitting the i, as y consonant, to articulate the succeeding vowel; as, Ei-æ-p'ia, (e-i-je'ya.) See these notes, pp. 894 and 904.—EDDOR.]

consonant, always forms a distinct syllable; as, Penelope, Hippocrene, Evoe, Amphitrite, &c. When any Greek or Latin word is Anglicized into this termination, by cutting off a syllable of the original, it becomes then an English word, and is pronounced according to our own analogy. Thus Acidalius, altered to Acidale, has the final e sunk, and is a word of three syllables only; Proserpine, from Proserpina, undergoes the same alteration. Thebes and Athens, derived from the Greek Θήβαι and Ἀθήναι, and the Latin Thebæ and Athenæ, are perfectly Anglicized; the former into a monosyllable, and the latter into a dissyllable; and the Greek Κρήτη and the Latin Creta have both sunk into the English monosyllable Crete. Hecate, likewise pronounced in three syllables when Latin, and in the same number in the Greek word Ἑκάτη, in English is universally contracted into two, by sinking the final e. Shakspeare seems to have begun, as he has now confirmed, this pronunciation, by so adapting the word in "Macbeth":

"Why, how now, Hecate? you look angerly."—Act IV.

Perhaps this was no more than a poetical license to him; but the actors have adopted it in the songs in this tragedy:

"Ho-cate, Ho-cate, come away."—

And the play-going world, who form no small portion of what is called the better sort of people, have followed the actors in this word, and the rest of the world have followed them.

The Roman magistrate, named ædilis, is Anglicized by pronouncing it in two syllables, æ'dile. The capital of Sicily, Syracuse, of four syllables, is made three in the English Syr'acuse; and the city of Tyrus, of two syllables, is reduced to a monosyllable in the English Tyre.

Rules for Pronouncing the Consonants of Greek and Latin Proper Names.

9. C and G are hard before a, o, and u; as, Cato, Comus, Cures, Galba, Gorgon, &c.; and soft before e, i, and y; as, Cebes, Scipio, Scylla, Cinna, Geryon, Geta, Gillus, Uyges, Gymnosophista, &c.*

10. T, S, and C, † before ia, ie, ii, io, iu, and eu,

* That this general rule should be violated by smatterers in the learned languages, in such words as gymnastic, heterogeneous, &c., is not to be wondered at; but that men of real learning, who do not want to show themselves off to the vulgar by such innocuous displays of their erudition, should give in to this irregularity, is really surprising. We laugh at the pedantry of the age of James I., where there is scarcely a page in any English book that is not sprinkled with twenty Greek and Latin quotations, and yet do not see the similar pedantry of interlarding our pronunciation with Greek and Latin sounds, which may be affirmed to be a greater perversion of our language than the former. In the one case, the introduction of Greek and Latin quotations does not interfere with the English phraseology; but, in the other, the pronunciation is disturbed, and a motley jargon of sounds introduced, as inconsistent with true taste as it is with neatness and uniformity.

[This censure is more severe than just. It is certain that these consonants were uniformly pronounced hard, by the Latins, before all the vowels indifferently; c like k, and g like the English g in gum. This is proved with respect to c by the Greek writers, who always spell Latin names in which it occurs with k; as Κικέρων, Σκίπιον, for Cicero, Scipio. On the other hand, the Romans express the Greek k by c; as Cimon for Κίμων. Hence Quintilian observes, C est littera, quæ ad omnes vocales vim suam perfolat. The hard sound of g is also apparent from words derived from the Greek, where γ is always represented by g; and that the analogy of sound is strictly preserved, is especially manifest in such words as angulus, from the Greek ἀγέλος. In these words, the first γ was always pronounced like g; and, preceded by the accent, in Latin words, as in English, change into sh and zh; as, Tatian, Statius, Portius, Portia, Sosius, Caduceus, Accius, Helvetii, Mænia, Hesiod, &c., pronounced Tashean, Statshus, Porshus, Porshæ, Soshus, Cadushus, Akshus, Helvoshæi, Mezheæ, Hezheod, &c. But when the accent is on the first of the diphthongal vowels, the preceding consonant does not go into sh, but preserves its sound pure; as, Miltiades, Antiates, &c.

11. T, S, and C, in proper names ending in tia, tia, cion, and sion, preceded by the accent, are changed into sh and zh. Thus Phocion, Sicyon, and Cercyon, are pronounced exactly in our own analogy, as if written Phoeshon, Sisheon, and Serashon; Artemisia and Aspasia sound as if written Artemisshæ and Aspashæ; Galatia, Aratia, Alotia, and Batia, as if written Galashæ, Arashæ, Aloshæ, and Basheæ; and, if Atia, the town in Campania, is not so pronounced, it is to distinguish it from Aria, the eastern region of the world. But the termination sion (of which there are not even twenty examples in proper names throughout the whole Greek and Latin languages) seems to preserve the t from going into sh, as the last remnant of a learned pronunciation, and to avoid, as much as possible, assimilating with so vulgar an English termination. Thus, though Æsion, Iasion, Dionysion, change the s into z, as if written Æzion, Iazion, Dionyzion, the z does not become zh; but Philition, Gratison, Eurytion, Androtion, Hippotion, Iphition, Ornysion, Metion, Polytion, Stratison, Sotion, Pallantion, Ætion, Harpocration, and Amphictyon, preserve the t in its true sound. Hephestion, however, from the frequency of appearing with Alexander, has deserted the small class of his Greek companions, and joined the English multitude, by rhyming with question; and Tatian and Theodotion seem perfectly Anglicized. With very few exceptions, therefore, it may be concluded that Greek and Latin proper names are pronounced alike, and that both of them follow the analogy of English pronunciation.

12. Ch. These letters, before a vowel, are always pronounced like k; as, Chabrias, Colchis, &c.; but, when they come before a mute consonant, at the beginning of a word, as in Chthonia, they are mute, and the word is pronounced as if written Thonia. Words as this sound is preserved in the Latin by a change of letter, it follows that the g, which represents the second γ, agrees with it in sound also. Since, therefore, the true pronunciation of these letters, c and g, corresponds with their English pronunciation before certain vowels, there is no great violence done to the harmony of language by adopting it, in Latin proper names, before all.—TALLORE.

† [The uniform and single sound of c has been noted in the note on the preceding rule; that of s and t were doubtless also single and uniform. That s had but one sound, like that of the English in sun, is evident from the Greek usage of the letter, and from the silence of all the old grammarians as to any variety in its pronunciation, — a remark which, by the way, will apply to all the consonants generally. With respect to t, the only difficulty regards the syllable ti, when followed by a vowel, as in the examples given in the rule. There is no doubt that ti was always pronounced alike by the Latins, whatever was the place of the accent; so that it was the same in Miltiades and Tatian, except that in the former it was long, and in the latter short, and therefore uttered with greater rapidity. This is evident from words common both to the Greeks and Romans, with the former of whom the pronunciation of ti never varies. In Latin names, also, the Greeks always retain the same letters, and vice versa. Thus we have Τίτος, Titius; and Πασσινωτίαν ἑαίν, Passinawianum Decem. Herod. l. II. It does not appear, indeed, that any sound like sh or zh was known to the Romans; nor is it likely that they pronounced the same letter differently in declining the same word; as, nom. pl. artes, gen. arshium, dat. arshibus, &c. These observations are equally applicable to the next rule.—TALLORE.] beginning with sche, as Schedius, Scheria, &c., are pronounced as if written Skedius, Skeria, &c.; and c before n, in the Latin pronomen Cneus, or Cneus, is mute; so in Cnopus, Cnossus, &c., and before t in Cteatus, and g before n in Gnidus,—pronounced Nopus, Nossus, Teatus, and Nidus.*

13. At the beginning of Greek words, we frequently find the uncombinable consonants mn, tm, &c.; as, Mnemosyne, Mnesidamus, Mneus, Mnesteus, Tmolus, &c. These are to be pronounced with the first consonant mute, as if written Nemosyne, Nesidamus, Neus, Nesteus, Molus, &c., in the same manner as we pronounce the words Bdelium, Pneumatic, Gnomon, Mnemonics, &c., without the initial consonant. The same may be observed of the c hard like k, when it comes before t, as Ctesiphon, Ctesippus, &c. Some of these words we see sometimes written with an e or i after the first consonant, as Menesteus, Timolus, &c., and then the initial consonant is pronounced.

14. Ph, followed by a consonant, is mute; as, Phthia, Phthiotis, pronounced Thia, Thiotis, in the same manner as the naturalized Greek word Phthiric, pronounced Tiic.

15. Ps:—p is mute also in this combination, as in Psyche, Psammetichus, &c., pronounced Syke, Sammeticus, &c.

16. Pt:—p is mute in words beginning with these letters, when followed by a vowel; as, Ptolemy, Pterilas, &c., pronounced Tolemy, Terilas, &c.; but, when followed by l, the t is heard, as in Tleptolemus; for, though we have no words of our own with these initial consonants, we have many words that end with them, and they are certainly pronounced. The same may be observed of the z in Zmitaces.

17. The letters s, x, and z, require but little observation, being generally pronounced as in pure English words. It may, however, be remarked, that s, at the end of words, preceded by any of the vowels but e, has its pure hissing sound; as, mas, dis, os, mus, &c.; † but, when e precedes, it goes into the sound of z; as, pes, Therites, vates, &c. It may also be observed, that, when it ends a word preceded by r or n, it has the sound of z. Thus the letter s, in mens, Mars, mors, &c., has the same sound as in the English words hens, stars, scars, &c. X, when beginning a word or syllable, is pronounced like z; as, Xerxes, Xenophon, &c., are pronounced Zerkses, Zenophon, &c. Z is uniformly pronounced as in English words. Thus the z in Zeno and Zeuigma is pronounced as we hear it in zeal, zone, &c.

Rules for Ascertaining the English Quantity of Greek and Latin Proper Names.

18. It may at first be observed, that, in words of two syllables, with but one consonant in the middle, what-

* [These letters are not absolutely mute, being accompanied with a small guttural tone, sufficient to indicate their effect upon the pronunciation. So in the next rule, the remark at the end of which proves that the guttural sound was so as to have nearly the same effect as the insertion of a vowel. Rules 14, 15, 16, are subject to the same remark. The word Tleptolemus, in Rule 16, can hardly be considered of the same class.—TROLOPE.]

† [Not only so, but in all cases, as before remarked; neither with e, r, or n preceding, is s necessarily pronounced like z.—TROLOPE.]

‡ The only word occurring to me, at present, where this rule is not observed, is canon, a rule, which is always pronounced like the word canon, a piece of ordinance. [Considerable difference, however, was made by the Romans between the long and short vowels, by pronouncing the latter more rapidly than the former. Probably a kind ever be the quantity of the vowel in the first syllable in Greek or Latin, we always make it long in English. Thus Crates, the philosopher, and crates, a hurdle; decus, honor, and dedo, to give; ovo, to triumph, and ovum, an egg; Numa, the legislator, and Numen, the divinity, have the first vowel always sounded equally long by an English speaker, although, in Latin, the first vowel in the first word of each of these pairs is short. †

19. On the contrary, words of three syllables, with the accent on the first, and with but one consonant after the first syllable, have that syllable pronounced short, let the Greek or Latin quantity be what it will. Thus regulus and remora, mimicus and minium, are heard with the first vowel short in English pronunciation, though the first word of each pair has its first syllable long in Latin; and the u, in fumigo and fugito, is pronounced long in both words, though in Latin the last u is short. This rule is never broken but when the first syllable is followed by e or i, followed by another vowel: in this case, the vowel in the first syllable is long, except that vowel be i. Thus lamia, genius, Libya, doceo, cupio, have the accent on the first syllable, and this syllable is pronounced long in every word but Libya, though in the original it is equally short in all.

20. It must have frequently occurred to those who instruct youth, that, though the quantity of the accented syllable of long proper names has been easily conveyed, yet that the quantity of the preceding unaccented syllables has occasioned some embarrassment. An appeal to the laws of our own language would soon have removed the perplexity, and enabled us to pronounce the initial unaccented syllables with as much decision as the others. Thus every accented antepenultimate vowel but u, even when followed by one consonant only, is, in our pronunciation of Latin, as well as in English, short. Thus fabula, separo, diigo, nobilis, cucumis, have the first vowels pronounced as in the English words capital, celebrate, simony, solitude, luculent, in direct opposition to the Latin quantity, which makes every antepenultimate vowel, in all these words but the last, long; and this we pronounce long, though short in Latin. But, if a semi-consonant diphthong succeed, then every such vowel is long but i in our pronunciation of both languages; and Euganeus, Eugenia, filius, folium, dubia, have the vowel in the antepenultimate syllable pronounced exactly as in the English words satiety, menial, dehrious, notorious, penurious; though they are all short in Latin but the i, which we pronounce short, though in the Latin it is long.

21. The same rule of quantity takes place in those syllables which have the secondary accent; for, as we pronounce lamentation, demonstration, diminution, domination, lucubration, with every vowel in the first syllable short but u, so we pronounce the same vowels of double emphasis was placed upon the long vowels, which the English pronunciation does not recognize. We make no difference, for instance, in the sound of the verb moror, whether it signifies to delay, or to be foolish. In the first signification it is short, in the latter long; and that the Romans marked this difference in their pronunciation, is evident from the sarcasm of Nero, pointed against his predecessor Claudius, Suet. Ner. 33: Morari cum inter homines desisset, producit syllabam primam. The anomaly would be removed by regularly pronouncing the long vowels as in the English words tama, scene, wine, bone, tame, and the short ones as in can, send, win, bond, tan, bone, tane, and the short ones as in can, send, win, bond, tan, added to the single sound of the consonant already described. The application of this rule to the examples produced in the following sections, if the quantity of the syllables be duly attended to, will sufficiently prove the advantages arising from this method of pronunciation.—TROLOPE.]

in the same manner in lamentatio, demonstratio, diminutio, dominatio, and lucubratio; but, if a semi-consonant diphthong succeed the secondary accent, as in Ariovistus, Heliodorus, Gabinianus, Herodianus, and Volusianus, every vowel preceding the diphthong is long but i, just as we should pronounce these vowels in the English words amiability, mediatorial, propitiation, excoriation, centurion, &c.

22. But, to reduce these rules into a smaller compass, that they may be more easily comprehended and remembered, it may be observed, that, as we always shorten every antepenultimate vowel with the primary accent but u, unless followed by a semi-consonant diphthong, though this antepenultimate vowel is often long in Greek and Latin, as Æschylus, Æschines, &c., and the antepenultimate i, even though it be followed by such a diphthong, as Eleusinia, Ocrisia, &c., so we shorten the first syllable of Æsculapius, Ænobarbus, &c., because the first syllable of both these words has the secondary accent; but we pronounce the same vowels long in Æthiopia, Ægialeus, Haliartus, &c., because this accent is followed by a semi-consonant diphthong.

23. This rule sometimes holds good, where a mute and liquid intervene, and determines the first syllable of Adrian, Adriatic, &c., to be long, like day, and not short, like add; and it is on this analogical division of the words, so little understood or attended to, that a perfect and a consistent pronunciation of them depends. It is this analogy that determines the first u to be long in stupidus, and the y short in clupea, though both are short in the Latin, and the o, in the first syllable of Coriolanus, which is short in Latin, to be long in English.

24. The necessity of attending to the quantity of the vowel in the accented syllable has sometimes produced a division of words in the following vocabulary that does not seem to convey the actual pronunciation.† Thus the words Sulpitius, Anicius, Artemisium, &c., being divided into Sul-pi'ti-us, A-ni'ci-um, Ar-te-mi'si-um, &c., we fancy the syllable after the accent deprived of a consonant closely united with it in sound, and which, from such a union, derives an aspirated sound equivalent to sh. But, as the sound of t, c, or s, in this situation, is so generally understood, it was thought more eligible to divide the words in this manner, than into Sul-pi'ti-us, A-ni'ci-um, Ar-te-mi'si-um, as, in the latter mode, the i wants its shortening consonant, and might, by some speakers, be pronounced, as it generally is in Scotland, like ee. The same may be observed of c and g, when they end a syllable, and are followed by e or i, as in Ac-ra'tus, Ac-i-da'li-a, Tig-el-li'rus, Teg'y-ra, &c., where, the c and g ending a syllable, we, at first sight, think them to have their hard sound; but, by observing the succeeding vowel, we soon perceive them to be soft, and only made to end a syllable in order to determine the shortness of the vowel which precedes.

25. The general rule, therefore, of quantity indicated by the syllabication adopted in the Vocabulary is, that, when a consonant ends a syllable, the vowel is always short, whether the accent be on it or not; and that, when a vowel ends a syllable with the accent on it, it is always long; † that the vowel u, when it ends a syllable, is long, whether the accent be on it or not; and that the vowel i, (3) (4) when it ends a syllable without the accent, is pronounced like e; but, if the syllable be final, it has its long, open sound, as, if the accent were on it; and the same may be observed of the letter y.

Rules for Placing the Accent of Greek and Latin Proper Names.

26. Words of two syllables, either Greek or Latin, whatever be the quantity in the original, have, in English pronunciation, the accent on the first syllable; and, if a single consonant come between two vowels, the consonant goes to the last syllable, and the vowel in the first is long; as, Cato, Ceres, Comus, &c.‡

27. Polysyllables, adopted whole, from the Greek or Latin, into English, have generally the accent of the Latin; that is, if the penultimate be long, the accent is on it; as, Severus, Democedes, &c.; if short, the accent is on the antepenultimate; as, Demosthenes, Aristophanes, Posthumus, &c.— See INTRODUCTION.

28. When Greek or Latin proper names are Anglicized, either by an alteration of the letters, or by cutting off the latter syllables, the accent of the original, as in appellatives under the same predicament, is transferred nearer to the beginning of the word. Thus Proserpina has the accent on the second syllable; but, when altered to Proserpine, it transfers the accent to the first. The same may be observed of Homerus, Virgilius, Horatius, &c., when Anglicized to Homer, Virgil, Horace, &c.

29. As it is not very easy, therefore, so it is not necessary, to decide where doctors disagree. When reasons lie deep in Greek and Latin etymology, the current pronunciation will be followed, let the learned do all they can to hinder it. Thus, after Hyperion has been accented by our best poets according to our own analogy, with the accent on the antepenultimate, as Shakspeare:—

"Hyperion's curls, the front of Jove himself."—Hamlet.

"_____ that was to this Hyperion to a satyr."—Ibid.

"_____ next day after dawn,
Doth rise and help Hyperion to his horse."—Henry 7th.

So Cooke, in his translation of Hesiod's Theogony, follows the accentuation of Shakspeare:—

"Hyperion and Japhet, brothers, join:
Thou and Rheas of this ancient line
Descend; and Themis boasts the source divine." }
}

"The fruits of This and Hyperion rise,
And with refulgent lustre light the skies."

After this established pronunciation, I say, how hopeless, as well as useless, would it be to attempt the penultimate accentuation! which yet ought undoubtedly to be preserved in reading or speaking Greek or Latin compositions, but, in reading or speaking English, must be left to those who would rather appear learned than judicious.‖ But Acron, Arion, Amphion.

* [It is more correct to pronounce these diphthongs long universally, which may be done without any violence to the ear of an Englishman.—TROLLORP. See note, p. 849.—EDITOR.]

† [This is not the case, if the correct method of pronunciation is adopted.—TROLLORP.]

‡ [Not according to the above method.—TROLLORP.]

§ [There is no doubt, as before observed, that the Latins made a difference in this respect. In dissyllables, the analogy of the English language will admit of this less readily than in polysyllables; but still an accentuated pronunciation may be employed to mark the distinction.—TROLLORP.]

‖ [Shakspeare's derivation from classical authority, in one word, does not invalidate the general property of the classical pronunciation. The penultima of Hyperion (Ἑρπεῖον)

Echion, Orion, Izion, Pandion, Arion, Alphion, Ærion, Ophion, Methion, Axion, Eion, Thlexion, and Sardonion, preserve their penultimate accent invariably; while Ethalion, a word of the same form and origin, is pronounced with the accent on the antepenultimate, like Deucalion and Pygmalion; and this, if I mistake not, is the common pronunciation of a ship in the British navy, so called from the name of the Argonaut, who accompanied Jason in his expedition to Colchis, to fetch the golden fleece.

30. The same difficulty of deciding between common usage and classical propriety appears in words ending in ia, as Alexandria, Antiochia, Seleucia, Samaria, Iphigenia,* and several others, which were pronounced, by our ancestors, as appears from their poetry, according to our own analogy, with the accent on the antepenultimate syllable; and there is no doubt but every word of this form would have fallen into the same accentuation, if classical criticism had not stepped in and prevented it. A philosophical grammarian would be apt to think we are not much obliged to scholars for this interruption of the vernacular current of pronunciation; but, as there is so plausible a plea as that of reducing words to their original languages, and as a knowledge of these languages will always be an honorable distinction among men, it is strongly to be suspected that these words will not long continue in their plain, homespun, English dress. This critical correction, however, seems to have come too late for some words, which, as Pope expresses it, have "slid into verse," and taken possession of our ears; and therefore, perhaps, the best way of disposing of them will be to consider them as the ancients did the quantity of certain doubtful syllables, and to pronounce them either way. Some, however, seem always to have preserved the accent of their original language, as Thakia and Sophia; but Iphigenia, Antiochia, Seleucia, and Samaria, have generally yielded to the English antepenultimate accent; and Erythia, Deidamia, Laodamia, Hippodamia, Apamia, Ilithyia, and Oriithyia, from their seldom appearing in mere English composition, have not often been drawn aside into plain English pronunciation. The same may be observed of words ending in nicus, or nice: if they are compounded of the Greek νικη, the penultimate syllable is always long, and must have the accent; as, Stratonicus, Berenice, &c.; if this termination be what is called a gentile, signifying a man by his country, the penultimate is short, and the accent is on the antepenultimate; as, Macedonicus, Sardonius, Britannicus, &c. — See ANDRONICUS.

31. Thus we see many of these proper names are of dubious accentuation; and the authorities which may be produced on both sides sufficiently show us the inutilty of criticizing beyond a certain point. It is in these as in many English words; there are some which, if mispronounced, immediately show a want of education; and there are others which, though not pronounced in the most erudite manner, stamp no imputation of ignorance or illiteracy. To have a general knowledge, therefore, of the pronunciation of these words, seems absolutely necessary for those who would appear respectable in the more respectable part of society. Perhaps no people on earth are so correct in the accentuation of proper names as the learned among the English. The Port-Royal Grammar informs us that, "notwithstanding all the rules that can be given, we are often under the necessity of submitting to custom, and of accommodating our pronunciation to what is received among the learned, according to the country we are in." "So we pronounce," says the grammarian, "Aristobulus,† Basilus, Idolium, with the accent on the antepenultimate, though the penultimate is long, because it is the custom; and, on the contrary, we pronounce Andreas, id'e'a, Maria, &c., with the accent on the penultimate, though it is short, because it is the custom of the most learned. The Italians," continues he, "place the accent on the penultimate of antonosasi'a, harmoni'a, philosophi'a, theologi'a, and similar words, according to the Greek accent, because, as Ricciolus observes, it is the custom of their country. Alvarez and Gretser think we ought always to pronounce them in this manner, though the custom, not only of Germany and Spain, but of all France, is against it; but Nebrissensis authorizes this last pronunciation, and says that it is better to place the accent of these vowels on the antepenultimate syllable; which shows," concludes the grammarian, "that, when we once depart from the ancient rules, we have but little certainty in practice, which is so different in different countries."

But, however uncertain and desultory the accentuation of many words may be, it is a great satisfaction to a speaker to know that they are so. There is a wide difference between pronouncing words of this kind ignorantly and knowingly. A person who knows that scholars themselves differ in the pronunciation of these words can always pronounce with security; but one who is unacquainted with the state of the accent is not sure that he is right when he really is so, and always pronounces at his peril.

. It is hoped the candid peruser of this work will make allowances for an occasional error in dividing a syllable or placing an accent, when he reflects on the difficulty with which such a work must necessarily be attended. The author flatters himself, however, that such attention has been paid both to the compilation and the proofs, that the fewest errors imaginable have escaped him. [A considerable number of such errors of inadvertence have been corrected in this edition. — EDITOR.]

is long in Hom. Il. T. 398, and Shakespeare evidently sacrificed quantity to the harmony of his versification. The sanction of an English poet will scarcely justify the translator of Hesiod in following his irregularities. The word Ethalion is not in point. — TROLLORP.
* [These words are written, in Greek, with the diphthong ei; but, in Latin, the penultima may be considered common, as that in Academia, which is spelt with ei in Greek, but made short by Juvenal. In English, therefore, it would be the worst of affectation to accent them otherwise than long-established usage warrants. A characteristic anecdote is related of the late eccentric Dr. Ferr, in reference to the modern pronunciation of them. Being one day consulted, by an amiable professor, as to the propriety of accenting the penultima of the word Alexandria, he surprised him with the following satisfactory admonition. "I must call it Alexandri'a; but I would advise you to call it Alexan'dria." — TROLLORP.

† [Our author properly accents Aristob'ulus; but the error of the grammarian does not affect the argument. — TROLLORP.]

RULES

REFERRED TO IN THIS EDITION BY THE FIGURES IN THE COLUMNS OF THE FOLLOWING VOCABULARY.

☞ The sounds of the vowels, as long, short, &c., were not marked by Walker in his Key; but the same system of notation that is used in the preceding Dictionary has been applied to this edition of the Key, by the Ed. W., and thus any special reference, by numbers, to the preceding Rules of Walker is rendered unnecessary.

*The following Rules have been taken substantially from Walker; No. 1, from the 10th and 11th of the preceding Rules; No. 2, from the 11th; No. 3, from Walker's notes, in the Terminational Vocabulary, relating to terminations ia, eia, and eius, (see pages 894 and 904); No. 4, from the 5th Rule; and No. 5, from the 13th, 14th, 15th, and 16th Rules.*

RULE 1.—The consonants c, s, t, and x, before ia, ie, ii, io, iu, eu, and yo, preceded by the accent, in Latin and Greek words, as in English, commonly take the sound of sh, as in the following words: Por'ti-a, (pör'she-a,) A-lex'i-a, (a-lék'she-a,) Cly'ti-e, (klish'e-é,) Hel-ve'ti-i, (hel-ve'she-i,) Pho'ci-on, (fö'she-ön,) Ac'ci-us, (äk'she-üs,) Ca-du'ce-us, (ka-dü'she-üs,) Si'cy-on, (sish'e-ün).—When s, preceded by the accent, is followed by ia, or io, it takes the sound of zh; as, Mæ'ri-a, (mé'zhe-a,) He'si-od, (hé'zhe-od).—According to Walker, the words Asia, Sosia, and Theodoric, are the only exceptions.

RULE 2.—In some proper names, t preserves its true sound; as, Ætion, Amphictyon, Androtion, Eurytion, Gratian, Harpocratian, Hippotion, Iphition, Metion, Ornytion, Pallantion, Philition, Polytion, Solion, Stratian, and a few others; but Hephæstion and Theodotion are Anglicized, the last syllables being pronounced like the last syllables in question and commotion. In the words Ætion, Dionysion, and Iasion, the s takes the sound of z, but not of zh.

RULE 3.—In words ending in ia, ei, eium, and eius, with the accent on the e, the i following the accent is to be understood as articulating the following vowel, like y consonant; as, Elege'ia (el-e-jé'ya,) Pompe'i, (pom-pé'yi,) Pompeium, (pom-pé'yum,) Pompe'ius, (pom-pé'yus.) The same rule also applies to words ending in ia, preceded by a or o having the accent upon it, as Acha'ia, (a-ká'ya,) Lato'ia, (la-tó'ya,) and likewise to words having the accent on a vowel, followed by ia, though they may not end the word, as Ple'iades, (plé'ya-déz.)

Note.—In the different editions of Walker's Key, there is an inconsistency with regard to the class of words ending in ia, ei, eium, and eius. In some of them, the accent is placed on the e, as in Apule'ius; while others have it placed on the i, as Pompe'ius; and, in some cases, the same word is differently accented in the Initial and Terminational Vocabularies; but, in his notes on the terminations EIA and EIUS, in the Terminational Vocabulary, Walker decides in favor of placing the accent on the e, including the whole list "under the same general rule, that of sounding the e separately, and the i like y consonant." In this Vocabulary, all the words of this class have the accent placed upon the e.

RULE 4.—The diphthongs æ and æ, ending a syllable with the accent on it, are pronounced like long e, as in Cæ'sar, (sé'zar;) but, when followed by a consonant in the same syllable, like short e, as in Dæd'alus, (déd'a-lüs.)

RULE 5.—In Greek and Latin words, which begin with uncombunable consonants, the first letter is silent: thus C in Cneus and Ctesiphon, M in Mneus, P in Psyche and Ptolemy, Ph in Phthia, and T in Tmolus, are not sounded.

PRONUNCIATION

INITIAL VOCABULARY.

The words to which the letter (C) is annexed have been taken from Mr. Carr's "Classical Pronunciation of Proper Names."

The words to which the letter (T) is annexed are words which were added by Mr. Trollope, in his edition of Walker's Key.

The words to which the letter (S) is annexed have been derived from Scheller's Latin and German Lexicon.

The words which have not one of the above letters annexed to them are to be found in Walker's Key.

When a word is repeated, for the purpose of showing a deviation from Walker's pronunciation by Carr, the letter (C) is annexed to the word as pronounced by Carr; as, for example, the word Abasa is pronounced Ab-a'sa by Walker, and Ab'a-sa by Carr.

The figures annexed to the words refer to the Figs Rules of Pronunciation, on page 854. Thus the figure (1) annexed to Abantias refers to Rule 1, which shows that the word is pronounced A-ban'she-ds.

The Rules referred to in the notes at the bottom of the pages, are Walker's Rules for Pronouncing the Vowels of Greek and Latin Proper Names, found on pages 849—853.

The words in Italics are the preceding words Anglicized. Thus the Latin word Adrianus is changed, in English, into Adrian.

* Abá. — Every a, ending a syllable, with the accent upon it, is pronounced like the a in the English words favor, father, &c. See Rule 1, prefixed to this Vocabulary.

† Abána. — Every unaccented a, whether initial, medial, or final, ending a syllable, has an obscure sound, bordering on the a in father. See Rule 7, prefixed to this Vocabulary.

[In this Key, as prepared by Walker, the vowels had no marks of long, short, &c.; but in this edition, they are marked so as to indicate their sound in accordance with Walker's Rules. — EDITOR.]

‡ Achabytos. — Ch, in this and all the subsequent words, have the sound of k. Thus Achabytos, Achca, Achates, &c., are pronounced as if written Akabytos, Akca, Akates, &c. See Rule 12.

* Amphigenia.—See IPHIGENIA, and Rule 30, prefixed to this Vocabulary.

† Anadyomene.—This epithet, from the Greek ἀναδυόμενος, signifying rising out of the water, is applied to the picture of Venus rising out of the sea, as originally painted by Apelles. I doubt not that some, who only hear this word without seeing it written, suppose it to mean Anno Domini, the year of our Lord.

‡ Andronicus.—This word is uniformly pronounced, by our prosodists, with the penultimate accent; and yet, soaverse is an English ear to placing the accent on the penultimate i, that, by all English scholars, we hear it placed upon the antepenultimate syllable. That this was the pronunciation of this word in Queen Elizabeth's time, appears plainly from the tragedy of Titus Andronicus, said to be written by Shakspeare; in which we every where find the antepenultimate pronunciation adopted. It may, indeed, be questioned whether Shakspeare's learning extended to a knowledge of the quantity of this Greco-Latin word; but, as Mr. Stevens has justly observed, there is a greater number of classical allusions in this play than are scattered over all the rest of the performance on which the accent of Shakspeare is indubitably fixed; and therefore it may be presumed that the author could not be ignorant of the Greek and Latin pronunciation of this word, but followed the received English pronunciation of his time; and which, by all but professed scholars, is still continued.—See SOANOROCES.—The analogy of the language, with which Shakspeare's authority can have nothing to do, is decisive in favor of the penultimate accentuation.—TROLOPE.

• Eridanus. — "Alpheus and Eridanus the strong, That rises deep, and stately rolls along." Cook's's Heroid. Theog. v. 530.

† Erythas. — "Chrysaor, Love the guide, Callirhoë led, Daughter of Ocean, to the genital bed, Whence Geryon sprung, fierce with his triple head; Whom Hercules laid breathless on the ground In Erythas, which the waves surround." Cook's's Heroid. Theog. v. 523.

The Greek is Ἐρυθραία. — THEOLOG.]

‡ Esomene. — It is not a little surprising that so elegant a writer as Hughes should, throughout the whole tragedy of the Siege of Demaeus, accent this word on the penultimate syllable; especially as there is not a single proper name, of more than two syllables, in the Greek or Latin languages, of this termination, which has the penultimate syllable long. Lee has done the same in the tragedy of Alexander, which would lead us to suppose there is something naturally repugnant to an English ear in the antepenultimate accentuation of these words, and something agreeable in the penultimate.

§ Euthalia. — Labbe observes that this word does not come from the muse Thalia, as some suppose, but from the masculine Euthalia; as Eulalia, Emencia, Eustolia, Eustropia, Emencia, &c., which are professedly accented on the antepenultimate. See Rule 30.

Table listing Greek and Latin proper names with their syllabic breakdowns. Columns include Greek names (e.g., I-dōm-ēs), Latin names (e.g., I-lyr-gia), and other forms (e.g., I-n-dib-ī-lis). The table is organized into four columns.

Greek idea, in opposition to the Latin, which we generally follow in other cases, and which, in this word, has the penultimate short, in Ainworth, Labbe, and our best prosodists; and, according to this analogy, ideas ought to have the accent on the first syllable, and that syllable short, as the first of idiot.

* Homonymous. — The termination of nouns in sus was, among the ancients, sometimes pronounced in two syllables, and sometimes, as a diphthong, in one.

“Eumenidum veluti demens videt agmina Pentheus.” Vira.

He observes, however, that the Latin poets very frequently dissolved the diphthong into two syllables:

“Naiadum cotu, tantum non Orpheus, Hebrum Ponaque respectus, et nunc manet Orpheus in te.”

The best rule, therefore, that can be given to an English reader, is, to pronounce words of this termination always with the vowels separated, except an English poet, in imitation of the Greeks, should preserve the diphthong; but, in the present word, I should prefer I-dem-ō-nens to I-dem-ō-nēs, whether in verse or prose.

“Eumenidum veluti demens videt agmina Pentheus.” Vira.

“Hec Proteus, et se factu dedit equor in altum.” Vira.

But, out of poetry, the termination sus must be dissolved according to the analogy of the Latin language, (as Dnus, from Lūs,) when the penultimate e, representing the Greek s in the original, will, of course, be short; as, Orphēus, Theōus, &c.

† Iamnes. — All our prosodists make the penultimate syllable of this word short, and consequently accent it on the antepenultimate; but Milton, by a license he was allowed to take, accents it on the penultimate syllable:

“As when a vulture on Iamnes bred, Whose snowy ridge the roving Tartar bounds.”

§ Iphigenia. — The antepenultimate syllable of this word had been in quiet possession of the accent for more than a century, till some Greeklings, of late, have attempted to place the stress on the penultimate, in compliment to the original Ἰφιγένεια.

Another striking instance of the same accentuation appears in the first two verses of the Iliad:

Mήνιν ἄειδε θεὰ Πηληϊάδεω Ἀχιλῆος Ὀλομένην, ἣ νοσήει Ἀχαιῶς ἔμμεν ἰθύνε

I know it may be said that the written accents we see on Greek words are of no kind of authority, and that we ought always to give accent to penultimate long quantity, as the Latins did. Not here to enter into a dispute about the authority of the written accents, the nature of the acute, and its connection with quantity, which has divided the learned of Europe for so many years.

|| Iphimedia. — This and the foregoing word have the accent on the same syllable, but for what reason cannot be easily conceived. That Iphigenia, having the diphthong ei in its penultimate syllable, should have the accent on that syllable, though not the soundest, is at least a plausible reason.

the quantity, as the regulator of accent. We know it was an axiom in Greek prosody, that when the last syllable was long by nature, the accent could not rise beyond the penultimate; but we know, too, that this axiom is abandoned in Demosthenes, Aristoteles, and a thousand other words. The only reason, therefore, that remains for the penultimate accentuation of this word, is, that this syllable is long in some of the best poets. Be it so. Let those who have more learning and leisure than I have find it out. In the interim, as this may, perhaps, be a long one, I must recur to my advice under the last word; though Ainsworth has, in my opinion, very properly, left the penultimate syllable of both these words short, yet those who affect to be thought learned will always find their account in departing as far as possible from the analogy of their own language in favor of Greek and Latin. [Carr gives as the Greek ἰσχυρισμός. — Enarr.]

* Lachesis. —

* Megera. — I have, in this word, followed Labbe, Ainsworth, Gouldman, and Holyoke, by adopting the antepenultimate accent, [Carr does the same.] in opposition to Leprieux, who accents the penultimate syllable.
† Megara. — Labbe pronounces this word in four syllables, when a noun substantive; but Ainsworth marks it as trisyllable, when a proper name, and, in my opinion, incorrectly. — See IDOMENEUS. — [Ainsworth is right. See Ovid. Met. x. 606. — Trallopz.]

† Meloboris. — In this word I have given the preference to the antepenultimate accent, with Labbe, Gouldman, and Holyoke, [also Carr,] though the penultimate, which Leprieux has adopted, is more agreeable to the ear. — [In both the second and third syllables, the e is the Greek emicron. — Trallopz.]

* Mulucka.—This word is accented on the antepenultimate syllable by Labbe, Lempriere, and Ainsworth, and on the penultimate by Gouldman and Holyoke. Labbe, indeed, says, ut volueris; and I shall certainly avail myself of this permission to place the accent on the penultimate; for, when this syllable ends with u, the English have a strong propensity to place the accent on it, even in opposition to etymology, as in the word Arbutus.

† Mycala and Mycos, [Mutina].—An English ear seems to have a strong predilection for the penultimate accent on these words; but all our prosodists accent them on the antepenultimate. The same may be observed of Mutina. See note on Oryzus.—[Ovid. Met. xii. 263: Mater erat Mycale, &c.—vii. 463: Hinc kasium Myconum, &c.—xv. 823: Victa potest Mutina, &c.—TROLLOR.]

† Myrina.—Labbe is the only prosodist I have met with who accents this word on the antepenultimate syllable; and, as this accentuation is so contrary to analogy, I have followed Lempriere, Ainsworth, Gouldman, and Holyoke, with the accent on the penultimate. See the word in the Terminational Vocabulary.—[This may be true of the epithet of Apollo, so called from the town Myrina, but not of the name of a gladiator mentioned in Mart. Epig. xii. 29: Neper cum Myrina pectetur, &c.—TROLLOR.]

§ [Nasica.—The penultimate is long.—EDDOR.
"Nasica excepti templi non extitit auctor."—OVID.]

|| [Nemes; Nemē.—The penultimate is short.—EDDOR.
"Et vastum Nemes sub rupe leonem."—VIRGIL.]

¶ [Nocula.—Labbe, Ainsworth, Gouldman, Lempriere, and Holyoke, [also Carr,] give this word the penultimate accent; and therefore I have preferred it to the antepenultimate accent given it by Lempriere, not only from the number of authorities in its favor, but from its being more agreeable to analogy.—[Compare Hor. Od. lii. 13, 5.—TROLLOR.]

 [Noris.—The authorities are nearly equally balanced between the penultimate and antepenultimate accent; and therefore I may say, as Labbe sometimes does, ut volueris; but I am inclined rather to the antepenultimate accent, as more agreeable to analogy, though I think the penultimate more agreeable to the ear.

†† [Nereus.—[See IONOMENUS.—EDDOR.]
"Old Nereus to the Sea was born of Earth,— Nereus, who claims the precedence in birth
To their descendants; him old god they call,
Because sincere and affable to all."

* Menecris. — Labbe, Ainsworth, Gouldman, and Holyoke give this word the antepenultimate accent; but Lemriere, Littleton, and the Graduates, place the accent, more greedily to analogy, on the penultimate. — [The latter is correct. See Ovid. Met. viii. 436. Fast. v. 97 — Truollop.]

† Musicius. — "Our fleet Apollo sends Where Tuscan Tyber rolls with rapid force, And where Musicius opens his holy source."

† Musidus. — Lemriere places the accent on the penultimate syllable of this word, but Labbe, Gouldman, and Holyoke, [also Carr,] on the antepenultimate. Ainsworth marks it in the same manner among the appellatives, nor are there be any doubt of its propriety

§ Oceana. — So prone are the English to lay the accent on the penultimate of words of this termination, that we scarcely ever hear the famous Oceana of Harrington pronounced otherwise.

|| Ogyrus, [Ogyrus]. — This diphthong, like o, is pronounced as the single vowel a. If the conjecture concerning the sound of o was right, the middle sound between the o and e of the ancients must, in all probability, have been the sound of our a in water. — See the word Ōa.

¶ Ogyrus. — This word is, by all our prosodists, accented on the first syllable, and consequently it must sound exactly as if written Ōd̄'ŋ-ŋ-ŋ; and this, however odd to an English ear, must be complied with. — [Ogyrus is the most correct pronunciation. The quantity is marked in the derivative Ogyris, in Lucan. Phars. l. 675: Edenis Ogygio decurrit plena Lyao. — Truollop.]

* Smintheus. — This word, like Orpheus, and others of the same form, has the accent on the first syllable; but poets often contract the two last syllables into one; as Pope: —

“ O Smintheus, sprung from fair Latona's line, Thou guardian power of Cilla the divine!”

— See Idomeneus. [And notes. — Editor.]

† Sophronicus. — I find this word in no prosodist but Labbe; and he places the accent on the penultimate syllable, like most other words of this termination; “unless,” says he, “any one think it more likely to be derived from lophron, than from victory,” that is, by uniting a general termination to the root of the word, than combining it with another word significant of itself. But, as there is a Greek adjective σωφρονικός, signifying ordained by nature to temperance, it is much more probable that Sophronicus is this adjective, used substantively, than that it should be compounded of σωφρον and νικος, conquering temperance; and therefore the antepenultimate accent seems preferable.

‡ Sporades. — This word has the accent placed on the first syllable by all our prosodists; but a mere English ear is not only inclined to place the accent on the second syllable, but to pronounce the word as if it were a dissyllable, Sporades; but this is so gross an error that it cannot be too carefully avoided.

§ Suidas. — This word is generally heard, even among the learned, in two syllables, as if written Sui-das. Labbe, however, makes it three syllables, and accents the first; “although,” says he, “by what right I know not, it is generally pronounced with the accent on the penultimate.” It may be observed, that, if we place the accent on the first syllable, the i in the second must be pronounced like e; and that the general pronunciation which Labbe complains of, that of placing the accent on the second syllable, must, in our English pronunciation of Greek or Latin words, preserve the i in its long, open sound, as in idea. If, therefore, we pronounce the i in this manner, it is a sufficient proof that we place the accent on the penultimate syllable, which, though common, is, as Labbe observes, without good authority.

* Troilus. — This word is almost always heard as if it were two syllables only, and as if written Troylus. This is a corruption of the first magnitude: the vowels should be kept separate, as if written Tro'e-lus. — See ZOLLNER.

† Tyzeus. — This word is only used as an adjective to Apollonius, the celebrated Pythagorean philosopher, and is formed from the town of Tyzeus, where he was born. The natural formation of this adjective would, undoubtedly, be Tyzeus, with the accent on the antepenultimate syllable. Labbe, at the word Tyzeus, says, "Et inde deductum Tyzeus, quidquid sciam reclamare nonnullis sed immerito, ut satis norunt eruditi."

The numerous authorities which might be brought for pronouncing this word either way, sufficiently show how equivocal is its accent, and of how little importance it is to which we give the preference. My private opinion coincides with Labbe; but, as we generally find it written with the diphthong, we may presume the penultimate accent has prevailed, and that it is the safest to follow. — [Unquestionably. — TROLLORZ. — Carr accents it Ty'e-nē-ús. — EDITOR.]

‡ Tyzeus. — This word, like several others of the same termination, was pronounced by the Greeks sometimes in three, and sometimes in two, syllables, the u considered as a diphthong. When it was pronounced in three syllables, the penultimate syllable was long, and the accent was on it, as we find it in a verse of WILKINS'S Epigoniad: —

"Venus, still partial to the Theban arms, Tyzeus' son seduced by female charms."

But the most prevailing pronunciation was that with the antepenultimate accent, as we generally find it in Pope's Homer: —

"Next came Idomeneus and Tydeus' son, Ajax the less, and Ajax Telamon."

— See IDOMENEUS.

§ Fennius. — Though the accent may be placed either on the antepenultimate or the penultimate syllable of this word, the latter is by far the preferable, as it is adopted by Lempriere, Labbe, Gouldman, [also Carr,] and other good authorities. — [Mart. Epig. xiii. 101. 1: Saxa Fennia in Hor. Od. ii. 6. 16. — TROLLORZ.]

¶ Ferrago. — I have given this word the penultimate accent, with Lempriere, in opposition to Answarth, who adopts the antepenultimate.

⌌ Br inspecting the foregoing Vocabulary, we see that, notwithstanding all the barriers with which the learned have guarded the accentuation of the dead languages, still some words there are which despise their laws, and boldly adopt the analogy of English pronunciation. It is true, the catalogue of these is not very numerous; for, as an error of this kind incurs the penalty of being thought illiterate and vulgar, it is no wonder that a pedantic adherence to Greek and Latin should, in doubtful cases, be generally preferred.

But as the letters of the dead languages have insensibly changed their sound by passing into the living ones, so it is impossible to preserve the accent from sliding, sometimes, into the analogies of our own tongue; and when once words of this kind are fixed in the public ear, it is not only a useless, but a pernicious, pedantry to disturb them. Who could hear, without pity, of Alexander's passing the River Granicus, † or of his marrying the sister of Parysatis? These words, and several others, must be looked upon as planets shot from their original spheres, and moving round another centre.

After all the care, therefore, that has been taken to accent words according to the best authorities, some have been found so differently marked by different prosodists, as to make it no easy matter to know to which we shall give the preference. In this case, I have ventured to give my opinion, without presuming to decide, and merely as an Ἠρωτικόν, or Interim, till the learned have pronounced the final sentence.

* Zenodotus. — All our prosodists but Lempriere give this word the antepenultimate accent; and, till a good reason be given why it should differ from Herodotus, I must beg leave to follow the majority.

† Zēlus. — The two vowels, in this word, are always separated in the Greek and Latin; but, in the English pronunciation of it, they are frequently blended into a diphthong, as in the words oil, boil, &c. This, however, is an illiterate pronunciation, and should be avoided. The word should have three syllables, and be pronounced as if written Zē-s-lus.

‡ [Notwithstanding this remark, Walker has placed this word with the accent on the penultimate (Granicus) in his Terminational Vocabulary; and it stands first with the same accent in his Initial Vocabulary. — See GRAMMICA. — EDITOR.]

PREFACE

TO THE TERMINATIONAL VOCABULARY.

TAKING a retrospective view of language, or surveying it in its terminations, affords not only a new, but an advantageous view of all languages. The necessity of this view induced me, several years ago, to arrange the whole English language according to its terminations; and this arrangement I found of infinite use to me in consulting the analogies of our tongue. A conviction of its utility made me desirous of arranging the Greek and Latin proper names in the same manner, and more particularly, as the pronunciation of these languages depends more on the termination of words than any other we are acquainted with. Of such utility is this arrangement supposed to be in the Greek language, that the son of the famous Hoogveen, who wrote on the Greek Particles, has actually printed such a Dictionary, which only waits for a preface to be published. The labor of such a selection and arrangement must have been prodigious. Nor is the task I have undertaken, in the present work, a slight one; but the idea of rendering the classical pronunciation of proper names still more easy, encouraged me to persevere in the labor, however dry and fatiguing.

I flattered myself I had already promoted this end, by dividing the proper names into syllables upon analogical principles, but hoped I could still add to the facility of recollecting their pronunciation, by the arrangement here adopted; which, in the first place, exhibits the accent and quantity of every word by its termination.

In the next place, it shows the extent of this accentuation, by producing, at one view, all the words differently accented, by which means may be formed the rule and the exception.

Thirdly, when the exceptions are but few and less apt to be regarded, by seeing them contrasted with the rule they are imprinted more strongly on the memory, and are the more easily recollected. Thus, by seeing that Sperchius, Xenophonius, and Darius are the only words of that very numerous termination which have the accent on the penultimate, we are at perfect ease about all the rest.

Fourthly, by seeing that all words ending in enes have universally the antepenultimate accent, we easily recollect that the pronunciation of Eumenes with the accent on the penultimate is radically wrong, and is only tolerated because adopted by some respectable writers. Thus, too, the numerous termination in ades is seen to be perfectly antepenultimate; and the ambiguous termination in ides is freed, in some measure, from its intricacy, by seeing the extent of both forms contrasted. This contrast, without being obliged to go to Greek etymologies, shows, at one view, when this termination has the accent on the penultimate i, as in Tydidēs, and when it transfers the accent to the antepenultimate, as in Thucydides; which depends entirely on the quantity of the original word from which these patronymics are formed.

And, lastly, when the number of words pronounced with a different accent are nearly equal, we can, at least, find some way of recollecting their several accentuations better than if they were promiscuously mingled with all the rest of the words in the language. By frequently repeating them, as they stand together, the ear will gain a habit of placing the accent properly, without knowing why it does so. In short, if Labbe's Catholic Indices, which is in the hands of all the learned, be useful for readily finding the accent and quantity of proper names, the present Index cannot fail to be much more so, as it not only associates them by their accent and quantity, but according to their termination also; and by this additional association, it must necessarily render any diversity of accent more easily perceived and remembered.

To all which advantages it may be added, that this arrangement has enabled me to point out the true sound of every termination; by which means, those who are totally unacquainted with the learned languages, will find themselves instructed in the true pronunciation of the final letters of every word, as well as its accent and quantity.

It need scarcely be observed, that in the following Index, almost all words of two syllables are omitted; for, as disyllables in the Greek and Latin languages are always pronounced with the accent on the first, it was needless to insert them. The same may be observed of such words as have the vowel in the penultimate syllable followed by two consonants; for in this case, unless the former of these consonants were a mute, and the latter a liquid, the penultimate vowel was always long, and consequently always had the accent. This analogy takes place in our pronunciation of words from the Hebrew, which, with the exception of some few that have been Anglicized, such as Bethlehemite, Nazarene, &c., have the accent, like the Greek and Latin words, either on the penultimate or antepenultimate syllable.

It might have been expected that I should have confined myself to the insertion of proper names alone, without bringing in the gentile adjectives, as they are called, which are derived from them. This omission would, undoubtedly, have saved me immense trouble; but these adjectives, being sometimes used as substantives, made it difficult to draw the line; and, as the analogy of accentuation was, in some measure, connected with these adjectives, I hoped the trouble of collecting and arranging them would not be entirely thrown away.

* As the accent is never on the last syllable of Greek or Latin proper names, the final a must be pronounced as in English words of this termination; that is, nearly as the intersection a!! — See Rule 7, prefixed to the Initial Vocabulary.

† Of all the words ending in ica, Cleonica, Veronica, and Thessalonica, † are the only three which have the penultimate accent. — See Rule 29, prefixed to the Initial Vocabulary, and the words ΑΝΔΡΟΝΙΚΟΝ and ΣΟΥΡΑΝΟΝΙΚΟΝ.

‡ [Nasica (pronounced Næ-si-cæ). See Nasica, on page 876. — Entron.]

§ Florida. — Labbe tells us that some of the most learned men pronounce this part of America with the accent on the penultimate syllable.

|| Æchala. — The vowels in this termination do not form a diphthong. The accent is upon the first a, the i is pronounced like y consonant in year, and the final a nearly like the a in father, or the intersection a!! — See Rule 7.

¶ Words of this termination have the cia pronounced as if written sto-cæ. — See Rule 10, prefixed to the Initial Vocabulary.

 Seleucia. — See Rule 30, and the word in the Initial Vocabulary. [And likewise the following note. — Entron.]

* Elegia. — The ancients sometimes separated the vowels e in this termination, and sometimes pronounced them as a diphthong. The general mode of pronouncing them with us is to consider them as a diphthong, and to pronounce it as long or double e; which, from its squeezed sound, approaches to the initial y, and makes these words pronounced as if written El-e-jé-yah, Hy-jé-yah, &c. This is the pronunciation which ought to be adopted; but scholars who are fond of displaying their knowledge of Greek will be sure to pronounce Elegia, Hygeia, or rather Hygia, Anthea, and Diopsea, with the diphthong like the noun eye; while Carcæia, or Carcæia, Aquileia, Pompeia, and Tarpeia, of Latin original, are permitted to have their diphthongs sounded like double e, or, which is nearly the same thing, if the vowels be separated, to sound the e long, as in equal, and the i as y consonant, articulating the final a. — See note on Acheia.

Colonia, Polonia, Populonia, Vetulonia, Babyloonia, Acmona, Æmonia, Hermonia, Tremonia, Ammonia, Harmonia, Codanonia, Sinonia, Pannonia, Bononia, Lamponia, Pœponia, Cronia, Feronia, Sophronia, Petronia, Antroonia, Deponia, Tironia, Cæsonia, Ausonia, Latonia, Tritonia, Beltonia, Utonia, Hantonia, Vintonia, Wintonia, Bistonis, Plutonia, Favonia, Sclavonia, Livonia, Arnonia, Sazona, Exonia, Sicyonia, Narnia, Barua, Dorebernia, Hibernia, Cliterna, Lindisfontia, Vigerina, Wigronia, Libarna, Calburnia, Saturnia, Fornia, Daunis, Cæraunia, Acrocæraunia, Junia, Clunia, Neptunia, Ercynia, Sythimia, Macryia.

For a more complete idea of the sound of this diphthong, see the word PLAVANIS, in the Initial Vocabulary. To which observations we may add, that when this diphthong in Greek is reduced to the single long i in Latin, as in Iphigenia, Elegia, &c., it is pronounced like single i, that is, like the noun eye.

† Deldamia. — See Rule 30.

‡ Iphigenia. — See this word in the Initial Vocabulary.

§ Semaria. — For the accent of this word and Manabria, see Rule 30, prefixed to the Initial Vocabulary.

|| -sia. — The s in this termination, when preceded by a vowel, ought always to be sounded like z, as if written Amazhia, Aspachia, &c. Sia, Theodosia, and Sesia, seem to be the only exceptions.

* -ius. — Almost all the words of this termination are adjectives, and in these the vowels i form distinct syllables; the others, as Cocceius, Salcius, Procleius, Canuleius, Apuleius, Egnatuleius, Schœneius, Lampeius, Vultureius, Atteius, and Mynceius, are substantives; and which, though sometimes pronounced with the i forming a diphthong, and sounded like the noun eye, are more generally heard like the adjectives; so that the whole list may be fairly included under the same general rule, that of sounding the e separately, and the i like y consonant, as in the similar terminations in æ and ia. This is the more necessary in these words, as the accented e and the unaccented i are so much alike as to require the sound of the initial or consonant y, in order to prevent the hiatus, by giving a small diversity to the two vowels. — See ACHAIA.

† Heraclius. — Labbe [also Carr] places the accent of this word on the penultimate i, as in Heracides and Heracleus; but the Roman emperor of this name is so generally pronounced with the antepenultimate accent, that it would savor of pedantry to alter it. Nor do I understand the reasons on which Labbe founds his accentuation.

‡ Basilius. — This word, the learned contend, ought to have the accent on the penultimate; but that the learned frequently depart from this pronunciation, by placing the accent on the antepenultimate, may be seen, Rule 31, prefixed to the Initial Vocabulary. [Basilus, Cur. — Escurus.]

OF

ADVERTISEMENT.

THE true pronunciation of the Hebrew language, as Doctor Lowth observes, is lost. To refer us for assistance to the Masoretic points, would be to launch us on a sea without shore or bottom. The only compass by which we can possibly steer, on this boundless ocean, is the Septuagint version of the Hebrew Bible; and as it is highly probable the translators transfused the sound of the Hebrew proper names into the Greek, it gives us something like a clew to guide us out of the labyrinth. But even here, we are often left to guess our way; for the Greek word is frequently so different from the Hebrew, as scarcely to leave any traces of similitude between them. In this case custom and analogy must often decide, and the ear must sometimes solve the difficulty. But these difficulties relate chiefly to the accentuation of Hebrew words; and the method adopted in this point will be seen in its proper place.

I must here acknowledge my obligations to a very learned and useful work, — the “Scripture Lexicon” of Mr. Oliver. As the first attempt to facilitate the pronunciation of Hebrew proper names, by dividing them into syllables, it deserves the highest praise; but, as I have often differed widely from this gentleman in syllabication, accentuation, and the sound of the vowels, I have thought it necessary to give my reasons for this difference, which will be seen under the Rules; of the validity of which reasons the reader will be the best judge.

N. B. As there are many Greek and Latin proper names in Scripture, particularly in the New Testament, which are to be met with in ancient history, some of them have been omitted in this selection; and therefore, if the inspector do not find them here, he is desired to seek for them in the Vocabulary of Greek and Latin Names.

RULES FOR PRONOUNCING SCRIPTURE PROPER NAMES.

1. In the pronunciation of the letters of the Hebrew proper names, we find nearly the same rules prevail as in those of Greek and Latin. Where the vowels end a syllable with the accent on it, they have their long, open sound; as, Na'bal, Je'hu, Si'rach, Go'shen, and Tu'bal. — See Rule 1, prefixed to the Greek and Latin Proper Names.

2. When a consonant ends the syllable, the preceding vowel is short; as, San'u-el, Lem'u-el, Sim'e-on, Sol'o-mon, Suc'coth, Syn'a-gogue. (See Rule 2, prefixed to the Greek and Latin Proper Names.) I here differ widely from Mr. Oliver; for I cannot agree with him that the e in Abdiel, the o in Arnon, and the u in Ashur, are to be pronounced like the ee in seen, the o in tone, and the u in tune, which is the rule he lays down for all similar words.*

* [Mr. Oliver is unquestionably right in principle, and Mr. Walker wrong; but, though the analogy both of the Greek and Hebrew is in favor of the former, the general practice, and the analogy of the English language, are in favor of the latter. — TROLLORP.]

3. Every final i forming a distinct syllable, though unaccented, has the long, open sound, as A'i, A-ri'a-i. — See Rule 4, prefixed to the Greek and Latin Proper Names.

4. Every unaccented i ending a syllable not final, is pronounced like e, as A'ri-e'. Ab'di-el, pronounced A're-el, Ab'de-el. — See Rule 6, prefixed to the Greek and Latin Proper Names.

5. The vowels ai are sometimes pronounced in one syllable, and sometimes in two. As the Septuagint version is our chief guide in the pronunciation of Hebrew proper names, it may be observed, that when these letters are pronounced as a diphthong in one syllable, like our English diphthong in the word daily, they are either a diphthong in the Greek word, or expressed by the Greek s or i; as, Benai'ah, Barata; Hu'shai, Xu'i; Hu'rai, Ou'ri, &c.; and that when they are pronounced in two syllables, as Sham'ma-i, Shash'a-i, Ber-a-i'ah, it is because the Greek words by which they are translated, as, Samal, Saisis, Bapata, make two syllables of these vowels. Mr. Oliver has not always attended to this distinction: he makes Sin'a-i three syllables, though the Greeks made it but two in Σινᾶ. That accurate prosodist, Labbe, indeed, makes it a trisyllable; but he does the same by Aaron and Canaan, which our great classic, Milton, uniformly reduces to two syllables, as well as Sinai. If we were to pronounce it in three syllables, we must necessarily make the first syllable short, as in Shim'e-i; but this is so contrary to the best usage, that it amounts to a proof that it ought to be pronounced in two syllables, with the first i long, as in Shinar. This, however, must be looked upon as a general rule only; these vowels in Isaias, Grecized by Hoatas, are always pronounced as a diphthong, or at least with the accent on the a, and the i like y, articulating the succeeding vowel: in Caiaphas, likewise, the ai is pronounced like a diphthong, though divided in the Greek Καίάφας;* which division cannot take place in this word, because the i must then necessarily have the accent, and must be pronounced as in Isaac, as Mr. Oliver has marked it, but I think contrary to universal usage. The only point necessary to be observed in the sound of this diphthong, is the slight difference we perceive between its medial and final position; when it is final, it is exactly like the English ay without the accent, as in holyday, roundelay, galloway; but when it is in the middle of a word, and followed by a vowel, the i is pronounced as if it were y, and as if this y articulated the succeeding vowel; thus Ben-ai'ah is pronounced as if written Ben-a'yah.

6. Ch is pronounced like k, as Chebar, Chemosh, Enoch, &c., pronounced Kebar, Kemosh, Enock, &c. Cherubim and Rachel seem to be perfectly Anglicized, as the ch, in these words, is always heard as in the English words cheer, child, riches, &c. (See Rule 12, prefixed to the Greek and Latin Proper Names.) The same may be observed of Cherub, signifying an order of angels; but when it means a city of the Babylonish empire, it ought to be pronounced Ke'rub. †

7. Almost the only difference in the pronunciation of the Hebrew, and the Greek and Latin, proper names, is in the sound of the g before e and i. In the last two languages, this consonant is always soft before these vowels; as, Gel'ius, Gippius, &c., pronounced Jellius, Jippius, &c.; and in the first it is hard; as, Gera, Gerzim, Gideon, Gulgal, Megiddo, Megiddon, &c. This difference is without all foundation in etymology; for both g and c were always hard in the Greek and Latin languages, as well as in the Hebrew; but, the latter language being studied so much less than the Greek and Latin, it has not undergone that change which familiarity is sure to produce in all languages; and even the solemn distance of this language has not been able to keep the letter c from sliding into s, before e and i, in the same manner as in the Greek and Latin; thus, though Gehazi, Gideon, &c., have the g hard, Cedron, Cedron, Cisai, and cistern have the c soft, as if written Sedron, Sedron, &c. The same may be observed of Igebarim, Igal, Nagge, Shage, Pagiel, with the g hard, and Ocidelus, Ocina, and Pharacion, with the c soft like s. ‡

8. Gentiles, as they are called, ending in ines and ites, as Philistines, Hivites, Hittites, &c., being Anglicized in the translation of the Bible, are pronounced like formatives of our own; as, Philistins, Whitfieldites, Jacobites, &c.

9. The unaccented termination ah, so frequent in Hebrew proper names, ought to be pronounced like the a in father. The a in this termination, however, frequently falls into the indistinct sound heard in the final a in Africa, Etna, &c.; nor can we easily perceive any distinction, in this respect, between Elijah and Eliak; but the final h preserves the other vowels open; as, Colhozeh, Shiloh, &c., pronounced Colhozee, Shilo, &c. (See Rule 7, prefixed to the Greek and Latin Proper Names.) The diphthong ei is always pronounced like ee; thus Sa-me'us is pronounced as if written Sa-mee'us. But if the accent be on the ah, then the a ought to be pronounced like the a in father; as, Tah'e-ra, Tah'pe-nes, &c.

10. It may be remarked, that there are several Hebrew proper names, which, by passing through the Greek of the New Testament, have conformed to the Greek pronunciation; such as Aceldama, Genezareth, Bethphage, &c., pronounced Aceldama, Jenezareth, Bethphaje, &c. This is, in my opinion, more agreeable to the general analogy of pronouncing these Hebrew-Greek words, than preserving the c and g hard.

Rules for Ascertaining the English Quantity of the Vowels in Hebrew Proper Names.

11. With respect to the quantity of the first vowel in dissyllables, with but one consonant in the middle, I have followed the rule which we observe in the pronunciation of such dissyllables, when Greek or Latin words, (see Rule 13, prefixed to the Greek and Latin Proper Names;) and that is, to place the accent on the first vowel, and to pronounce that vowel long, as Ke'rah, and not Kor'ah, Mo'loch, and not Mol'ock, as Mr. Oliver has divided them, in opposition both to analogy and the best usage. I have observed the same analogy in the penultimate of polysyllables, and have not divided Balthasar into Bal-thas'ar, as Mr. Oliver has done, but into Baltha'sar.

* [It is not necessary to make either Ἰσαίας or Καίάφας more than a trisyllable. — TROLLOPE.]

† [According to analogy, ch should always be pronounced like k; and a Hebraist, in reading Hebrew, would so pronounce it, as well in Cherub as in Chebar. This would, however, savor of affectation in English; and even the appearance of affectation, in reading the Scriptures, cannot be too studiously avoided. — TROLLOPE.]

‡ [It is as usual to hear the g and c pronounced unsoftly hard, as partially; and as many of the clergy call the word Kedron as Sedron. — TROLLOPE.]

12. In the same manner, when the accent is on the antepenultimate syllable, whether the vowel end the syllable or be followed by two consonants, the vowel is always short, except followed by two vowels, as in Greek and Latin proper names. (See Rules prefixed to these names, Nos. 18, 19, 20, &c.) Thus Jehosaphat has the accent on the antepenultimate syllable, according to Greek accentuation by quantity, (see Introduction to this work,) and this syllable, according to the clearest analogy of English pronunciation, is short, as if spelt Je-hos'a-phat. The secondary accent has the same shortening power in Othonias, where the primary accent is on the third, and the secondary on the first syllable, as if spelt Oth-o-ni'as; and it is on these two fundamental principles of our own pronunciation, namely, the lengthening power of the penultimate, and the shortening power of the antepenultimate accent, that I hope I have been enabled to regulate and fix many of those sounds which were floating about in uncertainty, and which, for want of this guide, are differently marked by different orthoëpists, and often differently by the same orthoëpist.

Rules for Placing the Accent on Hebrew Proper Names.

13. With respect to the accent of Hebrew words, it cannot be better regulated than by the laws of the Greek language. I do not mean, however, that every Hebrew word which is Græcized by the Septuagint should be accented exactly according to the Greek rule of accentuation; for if this were the case, every word ending in el would never have the accent higher than the preceding syllable; because it was a general rule in the Greek language, that when the last syllable was long, the accent could not be higher than the penultimate. Nay, strictly speaking, were we to accent these words according to the accent of that language, they ought to have the accent on the last syllable, because 'Αβδηλ and 'Ισραηλ, Abdiel and Israel, have the accent on that syllable. It may be said that this accent on the last syllable is the grave, which, when on the last word of a sentence, or succeeded by an enclitic, was changed into an acute. But here, as in words purely Greek, we find the Latin analogy prevail; and because the penultimate is short, the accent is placed on the antepenultimate, in the same manner as in Socrates, Sosthenes, &c., though the final syllable of the Greek words Σωκράτης, Σωθίνης, &c., is long, and the Greek accent on the penultimate. (See Introduction prefixed to the Rules for Pronouncing Greek and Latin Proper Names.) It is this general prevalence of accenting according to the Latin analogy, that has induced me, when the Hebrew word has been Græcized in the same number of syllables, to prefer the Latin accentuation to what may be called our own. Thus, Cathua coming to us through the Greek Καθουά, I have accented it on the penultimate, because the Latins would have placed the accent on this syllable, on account of its being long, though an English ear would be better pleased with the antepenultimate accent. The same reason has induced me to accent Chaseba on the antepenultimate, because it is Græcized into Χασεβιά. But when the Hebrew and Greek word does not contain the same number of syllables, as Mes'o-bah, Μεσσηβία, Id'u-el, 'Ιδουήλος, it then comes under our own analogy, and we neglect the long vowel, and place the accent on the antepenultimate. The same may be observed of Mordecai, from Μαρδοχαιός.*

14. As we never accent a proper name from the Greek on the last syllable, (not because the Greeks did not accent the last syllable, for they had many words accented in that manner, but because this accentuation was contrary to the Latin prosody,) so if the Greek word be accented on any other syllable, we seldom pay any regard to it, unless it coincide with the Latin accent. Thus in the word Ged'e'rah, I have placed the accent on the penultimate, because it is Græcized by Γεδήρα, where the accent is on the antepenultimate; and this because the penultimate is long, and this long penultimate has always the accent in Latin. (See this further exemplified, Rule 18, prefixed to the Greek and Latin Proper Names, and Introduction, near the end.) Thus, though it may seem, at first sight, absurd to derive our pronunciation of Hebrew words from the Greek, and then to desert the Greek for the Latin, yet, since we must have some rule, and, if possible, a learned one, it is very natural to lay hold of the Latin, because it is nearest at hand. For as language is a mixture of reasoning and convenience, if the true reason lie too remote from common apprehension, another more obvious one is generally adopted; and this last, by general usage, becomes a rule superior to the former. It is true, the analogy of our own language would be a rule the most rational; but while the analogies of our own language are so little understood, and the Greek and Latin languages are so justly admired, even the appearance of being acquainted with them will always be esteemed reputable, and infallibly lead us to an imitation of them, even in such points as are not only insignificant in themselves, but inconsistent with our vernacular pronunciation.

15. It is remarkable that all words ending in ias and iah have the accent on the i, without any foundation in the analogy of Greek and Latin pronunciation, except the very vague reason that the Greek word places the accent on this syllable. I call this reason vague, because the Greek accent has no influence on words in ael, iel, ial, &c.; as, 'Ισραηλ, 'Αβδηλ, Βελίαλ, &c. τ. λ.

Hence we may conclude the impropriety of pronouncing Messias with the accent on the first syllable, according to Labbe, who says we must pronounce it in this manner, if we wish to pronounce it like the French with the os rotundum et facundum; and, indeed, if the i were to be pronounced in the French manner, like e, placing the accent on the first syllable seems to have the bolder sound. This may serve as an answer to the learned critic, the editor of Labbe, who says, "The Greeks, but not the French, pronounce ore rotundo;" for though the Greeks might place the accent on the i in Μεσσίας, yet as they certainly pronounced this vowel as the French do, it must have the same slender sound, and the accent on the first syllable must, in that respect, be preferable to it; for the Greek i, like the same letter in Latin, was the slenderest of all the vowel sounds. It is the broad, diphthongal sound of the English i, with the accent on it, which makes this word sound so much better in English than it does in French, or even in the true ancient Greek pronunciation.

16. The termination aim seems to attract the accent

* [The reader must judge how far this rule, in minor points, is correct. It is needless to say, that the editor can-

on the a only in words of more than three syllables, as E'phra-im and Miz'ra-im have the accent on the antepenultimate, but Ho-ro-na'im, Ram-a-tha'im, &c., on the penultimate syllable. This is a general rule; but, if the Greek word have the penultimate long, the accent ought to be on that syllable; as, Phar-da'im, Φαρου'ιμ, &c.

17. Kemuel, Jemuel, Nemuel, and other words of the same form, having the same number of syllables as the Greek words into which they are translated, ought to have the accent on the penultimate, as that syllable is long in Greek; but Emanuel, Samuel, and Lemuel,* are irrecoverably fixed in the antepenultimate accentuation, and show the true analogy of the accentuation of our own language.

18. Thus we see what has been observed of the tendency of Greek and Latin words to desert their original accent, and to adopt that of the English, is much more observable in words from the Hebrew. Greek and Latin words are fixed in their pronunciation by a thousand books written expressly upon the subject, and ten thousand occasions of using them; but Hebrew words, from the remote antiquity of the language, from the paucity of books in it, from its being originally written without points, and the very different style of its poetry from that of other languages, afford us scarcely any criterion to recur to for settling their pronunciation, which must, therefore, often be irregular and desultory. The Septuagint, indeed, gives us some light, and is the only star by which we can steer; but this is so frequently obscured as to leave us in the dark, and force us to pronounce according to the analogy of our own language. It were to be wished, indeed, that this were to be entirely adopted in Hebrew words, where we have so little to determine us, and that those words which we have worn into our own pronunciation were to be a rule for all others of the same form and termination; but it is easier to bring about a revolution in kingdoms than in languages. Men of learning will always form a sort of literary aristocracy; they will be proud of the distinction which a knowledge of languages gives them above the vulgar, and will be fond of showing this knowledge, which the vulgar will never fail to admire and imitate.

The best we can do, therefore, is to make a sort of compromise between this ancient language and our own; to form a kind of compound ratio of Hebrew, Greek, Latin, and English, and to let each of these prevail as usage has permitted them. Thus Emanuel, Samuel, Lemuel, which, according to the Latin analogy and our own, have the accent on the antepenultimate syllable, ought to remain in quiet possession of their present pronunciation, notwithstanding the Greek Ἐμμανουήλ, Σαμουήλ, Λεμουήλ; but Eliabur, Esdreton, Gederah, may have the accent on the penultimate, because the Greek words into which they are translated, Ἐλισούρι, Ἐσδρηλώμ, Γύδρηρα, have the penultimate long. If this should not appear a satisfactory method of settling the pronunciation of these words, I must entreat those who dissent from it to point out a better. A work of this kind was wanted for general use; it is addressed neither to the learned nor the illiterate, but to that large and most respectable part of society who have a tincture of letters, but whose avocations deny them the opportunity of cultivating them. To these a work of this kind cannot fail of being useful; and by its utility to these the author wishes to stand or fall.

* [Not Lemuel, which is frequently pronounced with the penultimate accent. Emanuel and Samuel are so completely

Anglicized as to render the Hebrew and Greek pronunciation intolerable to an English ear. — T. LLOYD.]

INITIAL VOCABULARY.

In this edition of this Key, the pronunciation of the words is in accordance with Walker's principles, but designated by the use of marked letters. All the words that seemed to need it, have been respelled, and thus any special reference, by numbers, to the preceding Rules of Walker, is rendered unnecessary.

With respect to the pronunciation of a considerable number of words, the deviations of several orthopists from Walker, are exhibited. These orthoepists are Oliver, Perry, Smart, Carr, and also Taylor the editor of "Calmet's Dictionary of the Bible." In relation to the words of which there is a diversity of pronunciation, the pronunciation given by Walker always stands first.

The abbreviation (O.) stands for Oliver; (P) for Perry; (Sm.) for Smart; (C.) for Carr; and (T.) for Taylor.

* Aaron.—This is a word of three syllables in Labbe, who says it is used to be pronounced with the accent on the penultimate; but the general pronunciation of this word in English is in two syllables, with the accent on the first, and as if written A'ron. Milton uniformly gives it this syllabication and accent:—

"Till by two brethren (those two brethren call Moses and Aaron) sent from God to claim
His people from intralment."

Par. Lost, b. xii. v. 170.

† Abarim.—This and some other words are decided in their accentuation, by Milton, in the following verses:—

"From Aroar to Nebo, and the wild
Of southmost Abarim in Hesebon,
And Horonaim, Seon's realm, beyond
The flowery dale of Sibma clad with vines,
And Elelé to th' Asphaltic pool."

Par. Lost, b. l. v. 407

"——— Yet his temple high
Reared in Azotus, dreathed through the coast
Of Palestine, in Gath and Ascalon,
And Accaron and Gaza's frontier bounds."

B. 463.

‡ Abram, or Abraham.—The first name, of two syllables, was the patriarch's original name; but God increased it to the second, of three syllables, as a pledge of an increase in blessing. The latter name, however, from the feebleness of the k in our pronunciation of it, and from the absence of the accent, is liable to such an hiatus, from the proximity of two similar vowels, that, in the most solemn pronunciation, we seldom hear this name extended to three syllables. Milton has but once pronounced it in this manner, but has six times made it only two syllables; and this may be looked upon as the general pronunciation.

§ Adonai.—Labbe, says his editor, makes this a word of three syllables only; which, if once admitted, why, says

* Bethpaga. — This word is generally pronounced, by the illiterate, in two syllables, and without the second á, as if written Beth'paga.
 † Canaan. — This word is not unfrequently pronounced in three syllables, with the accent on the second. But Milton, who, in his Paradise Lost, has introduced this word six times, has consistently made it two syllables, with the accent on the first. This is perfectly agreeable to the syllabication and accentuation of Isaac and Balaam, which are always heard in two syllables. This suppression of a syllable, in the latter part of these words, arises from the absence of accent. An accent on the second syllable would prevent the hiatus arising from the two vowels, as it does in Basal and Basim, which are always heard in two and three syllables respectively. — See ADONAI.

 † Casperanus. — This word is often, but improperly, pronounced with the accent on the penultimate.
 ‡ Cerak. — See Rule 6.
 § Deborah. — The learned editor of Labbe tells us that this word has the penultimate long, both in Greek and Hebrew, and yet he observes that our clergy, when reading the Holy Scriptures to the people in English, always pronounce it with the accent on the first syllable; “and why not,” says he, “when they place the accent on the first syllable of casar, auditor, and successor? But,” continues he, “I suppose they accent them otherwise, when they speak Latin.” Who doubts it?

* Israel.—This word is colloquially pronounced in two syllables, and not infrequently heard in the same manner from the pulpit. The tendency of two vowels to unite, when there is no accent to keep them distinct, is the cause of this corruption, as in Canaan, Isaac, &c.; but, as there is a greater difficulty in keeping separate two unaccented vowels of the same kind, so the latter corruption is more excusable than the former; and therefore, in my opinion, this word ought always, in public pronunciation, especially in reading the Scripture, to be heard in three syllables. Milton introduces this word four times in his Paradise Lost, and constantly makes it two syllables only. But those who understand English prosody know that we have a great number of words, which have two distinct impulses, that go for no more than a single syllable in verse, such as heaven, given, &c.; higher and dicer are always considered as disyllables, and hiss and dire, which have exactly the same quantity to the ear, but as monosyllables. Israel, therefore, ought always, in deliberate and solemn speaking, to be heard in three syllables. The same may be observed of Raphael and Michael.

[Jairus.—Our author had accented this word Jâ'i-rus, and would pronounce it Jâ'ô-rus; but he is wrong beyond all dispute. The Greek name is Ἰαϊρὸς.—Tholozan.]

* Rephael.—This word has uniformly the accent on the first syllable throughout Milton, though Grævised by him; for, in his Paradise Lost, he makes it four times of three syllables, and twice of two. What is observed under Jerem is applicable to this word. Colloquially, we may pronounce it in two, as if written Rephal; but, in deliberate and solemn speaking or reading, we ought to make the two last vowels be heard separately and distinctly. The same may be observed of Michael, which Milton, in his Paradise Lost, uses six times as a word of three syllables, and eighteen times as a word of two only.

† Sebacheni.—Some, says the editor of Labbe, place the accent on the antepenultimate syllable of this word, and others on the penultimate: this last pronunciation, he says, is most agreeable to the Hebrew word, the penultimate of which is not only long, but accented; and, as this word is Hebrew, it is certainly the preferable pronunciation.

‡ Sabbath.—This word should not be confounded in its pronunciation with Sabbāth, a word of so different a signification. Sabbath ought to be heard in three syllables, by keeping the a and e separate and distinct. This, it must be confessed, is not very easy to do, but is absolutely necessary to prevent a very gross confusion of ideas, and a perversion of the sense.—[According to the Masoretic points, the word is Sab-a'oth.—TROLLER. See SABAOTH, in the Dictionary.—EDITOR.]

§ Satan.—There is some dispute, among the learned, about the quantity of the second syllable of this word, when Latin or Greek, as may be seen in Labbe, but none about the first. This is acknowledged to be short; and this has induced those critics who have great knowledge of Latin, and very little of their own language, to pronounce the first syllable short in English, as if written Satana. If these gentlemen have not perused the Principles of Pronunciation, prefixed to the Critical Pronouncing Dictionary, I would take the liberty of referring them to what is there said, for full satisfaction, for whatever relates to deriving English quantity from the Latin. But, for those who have not an opportunity of inspecting that work, it may, perhaps, be sufficient to observe, that no analogy is more universal than that which, in a Latin word of two syllables, with but one consonant in the middle, and the accent on the first syllable, leads us to pronounce that syllable long. This is, likewise, the genuine pronunciation of English words of the same form; and, where it has been counteracted, we find a miserable attempt to follow the Latin quantity in the English word, which we entirely neglect in the Latin itself. (See Introduction, page 845.) Cato and Plato are instances where we make the vowel a long in English where it is short in Latin, and caligo and coegro where we make the a and e in the first syllable short in English when it is long in Latin. Thus, if a word of two syllables, with one consonant in the middle, and the accent on the first, which, according to our own vernacular analogy, we should pronounce as we do Cato and Plato, with the first vowel long,—if this word, I say, happen to be derived from a word of three syllables in Latin, with the first short, this is looked upon as a good reason for shortening the first syllable of the English word, as in magic, placid, lepid, &c., though we violate this rule in the pronunciation of the Latin words caligo, coegro, &c., which, according to this analogy, ought to be calo-i-go, coego-i-to, &c., with the first syllable long.

This pedantry, which ought to have a harsher title, has considerably hurt the sound of our language, by introducing into it too many short vowels, and consequently rendering it less flowing and sonorous. The tendency of the penultimate accent to open and lengthen the first vowel in dissyllables, with but one consonant in the middle, in some measure counteracts the shortening tendency of two consonants, and the almost invariable shortening tendency of the antepenultimate accent; but this analogy, which seems to be

* Zabala. — "Notwithstanding," says the editor of Labbe, "this word, in Greek, Ζαββαλον, has the penultimate long, yet in our churches we always hear it pronounced with the acute on the antepenultimate. Those who thus pronounce it plead that, in Hebrew, the penultimate vowel is short; but, in the word Zerobabel, Ζεροβάβελ, they follow a different rule; for, though the penultimate in Hebrew is long, they pronounce it with the antepenultimate accent." † Zerobabel. — See ΖΑΒΒΑΛΟΝ.

ADVERTISEMENT.

AFTER the many learned pens which have been employed on the subject of the following Observations, the author would have been much ashamed of obtruding his humble opinion on so delicate a point, had he not flattered himself that he had taken a material circumstance into the account, which had been entirely overlooked by almost every writer he had met with.

It is not a little astonishing, that, when the nature of the human voice forms so great a part of the inquiry into accent and quantity, its most marking distinctions should have been so little attended to. From a perusal of every writer on the subject,* one would be led to suppose that high and low, loud and soft, and quick and slow, were the only modifications of which the voice was susceptible; and that the inflections of the voice, which distinguish speaking from singing, did not exist. Possessed, therefore, of this distinction of sounds, the author at least brings something new into the inquiry; and if, even with this advantage, he should fail of throwing light on the subject, he is sure he shall be entitled to the indulgence of the learned, as they fully understand the difficulty of the question.

* The only exception to this general assertion is Mr. Steele, the author of "Prosodia Rationalis;" but the design of this gentleman is not so much to illustrate the accent and quantity of the Greek language as to prove the possibility of forming a notation of speaking sounds for our own, and of reducing them to a musical scale, and accompanying them with instruments. The attempt is undoubtedly laudable, but no further useful than to show the impossibility of it by the very method he has taken to explain it; for it is wrapped up in such an impenetrable cloud of music as to be unintelligible to any but musicians; and the distinctions of sound are so nice and numerous as to discourage the most persevering student from laboring to understand him. After all, what light can we expect will be thrown on this subject by one who, notwithstanding the infinitesimal distinctions he makes between similar sounds, says that the u in ugly, and the e in met and get, are diphthongs; that the e in may is long, and the same letter is nation short; and that the s in yes, use, &c. is always acute-grave, and the i in idle, try, &c. grave-acute?

PREPARATORY OBSERVATIONS.

As a perusa. of the Observations on Greek and Latin Accent and Quantity requires a more intimate acquaintance with the nature of the voice than is generally brought to the study of that subject, it may not be improper to lay before the reader such an explanation of speaking sounds as may enable him to distinguish between high and loud, soft and low, forcibleness and length, and feebleness and shortness, which are so often confounded, and which consequently produce such confusion and obscurity among our best prosodists.

But, as describing such sounds upon paper as have no definite terms appropriated to them, like those of music, is a new and difficult task, the reader must be requested to give as nice an attention as possible to those sounds and inflections of voice, which spontaneously annex themselves to certain forms of speech, and which, from their familiarity, are apt to pass unnoticed. But if experience were out of the question, and we were only acquainted with the organic formation of human sounds, we must necessarily distinguish them into five kinds; namely, the monotone, or one sound continuing a perceptible time in one note, which is the case with all musical sounds; a sound beginning low and sliding higher, or beginning high and sliding lower, without any perceptible intervals, which is essential to all speaking sounds. The two last may be called simple slides or inflections; and these may be so combined as to begin with that which rises, and end with that which falls, or to begin with that which falls, and end with that which rises; and if this combination of different inflections be pronounced with one impulse or explosion of the voice, it may not improperly be called the circumflex, or compound inflection; and this monotone, the two simple and the two compound inflections, are the only modifications, independent on the passions, of which the human voice is susceptible.

The Different States of the Voice

The modifications of the voice, which have just been enumerated, may be called absolute, because they cannot be converted into each other, but must remain decidedly what they are; while different states of the voice, as high and low, loud and soft, quick and slow, are only comparative terms, since what is high in one case may be low in another, and so of the rest. Beside, therefore, the modifications of voice which have been described, the only varieties remaining, of which the human voice is capable, except those produced by the passions, are high, low, loud, soft, quick, slow, forcible, and feeble. Though high and loud, and low and soft, are frequently confounded, yet, when considered distinctly, their difference is easily understood; as, if we strike a large bell with a deep tone, though it gives a very loud tone, it will still be a low one; and, if we strike a small bell with a high tone, it will still be a high tone, though the stroke be ever so soft. A quick tone, in music, is that in which the same tone continues but a short time, and a slow tone where it continues longer; but in speaking, a quick tone is that when the slide rises from low to high, or falls from high to low, in a short time, and a slow tone the reverse; while forcible and feeble seem to be severally compounded of two of these simple states; that is, force seems to be loudness and quickness, either in a high or low tone also; and feebleness seems to be softness and slowness, either in a high or a low tone likewise. As to the tones of the passions, which are so many and various, these, in the opinion of one of the best judges in the kingdom, are qualities of sound, occasioned by certain vibrations of the organs of speech, independent on high, low, loud, soft, quick, slow, forcible, or feeble; which last may not improperly be called different quantities of sound.

It may not, perhaps, be unworthy of observation, how few are these principles, which, by a different combination with each other, produce that almost unbounded variety of which human speech consists. The different quantities of sound, as these different states of the voice may be called, may be combined so as to form new varieties with any other that are not opposite to them. Thus high may be combined with either loud or soft, quick or slow; that is, a high note may be sounded either in a loud or soft tone, and a low note may be sounded either in a loud or a soft tone also, and each of these tones may be pronounced either in a longer or a shorter time; that is, more slowly or quickly; while forcible seems to imply a degree of loudness and quickness; and feeble, a degree of softness and slowness, either in a high or a low tone. These combinations may, perhaps, be more easily conceived by classing them in contrast with each other:—

High, loud, quick.
Low, soft, slow.

Foreible may be high, loud, and quick; or low, loud, and quick. Feeble may be high, soft, and slow; or low, soft, and slow.

The different combinations of these states may be thus represented:—

High, loud, quick, forcible.	Low, loud, quick, foreible.
High, loud, slow.	Low, loud, slow.
High, soft, quick.	Low, soft, quick.
High, soft, slow, feeble.	Low, soft, slow, feeble.

When these states of the voice are combined with the five modifications of voice above mentioned, the varieties become exceedingly numerous, but far from being incalculable. Perhaps they may amount (for I leave it to arithmeticians to reckon them exactly) to that number into which the ancients distinguished the notes of music, which, if I remember right, was about two hundred.

These different states of the voice, if justly distinguished and associated, may serve to throw some light on the nature of accent. If, as Mr. Sheridan asserts, the accented syllable be only louder, and not higher, than the other syllables, every polysyllable is a perfect monotone. If the accented syllable be higher than the rest, which is the general opinion both among the ancients and moderns, this is true only when a word is pronounced alone, and without reference to any other word; for when suspended at a comma, concluding a negative member followed by an affirmative, or asking a question beginning with a verb, if the unaccented syllable or syllables be the last, they are higher than the accented syllable, though not so loud. So that the true definition of accent is this:—If the word be pronounced alone, and without any reference to other words, the accented syllable is both higher and louder than the other syllables either before or after it; but, if the word be suspended, as at the comma, if it end a negative member followed by an affirmative, or if it conclude an interrogative sentence beginning with a verb, in each case the accented syllable is louder and higher than the preceding, and louder and lower than the succeeding syllables. This will be sufficiently exemplified in the following pages. In the mean time, it may be observed, that if a degree of swiftness enter into the definition of force, and the accented syllable be the most forcible, it follows that the accent does not necessarily lengthen the syllable, and that if it fall on a long vowel, it is only a longer continuation of that force with which it quickly or suddenly commenced; for as the voice is an efflux of air, and air is a fluid like water, we may conceive a sudden gush of this fluid to continue either a longer or a shorter time, and thence form an idea of long or short quantity. If, however, this definition of force, as applied to accent, should be erroneous or imaginary, let it be remembered it is an attempt to form a precise idea of what has hitherto been left in obscurity; and that, if such an attempt should fail, it may at least induce some curious inquirer to show where it falls, and to substitute something better in its stead.

If these observations be just, they may serve to show how ill-founded is the opinion of that infinite variety of voice of which speaking sounds consist. That a wonderful variety may arise from the key in which we speak, from the force or feebleness with which we pronounce, and from the tincture of passion or sentiment we infuse into the words, is acknowledged; but, speak in what key we will, pronounce with what force or feebleness we please, and infuse whatever tincture of passion or sentiment we can imagine into the words, still they must necessarily be pronounced with one of the foregoing modifications of the voice. Let us go into whatever twists or zigzags of tone we will, we cannot go out of the boundaries of these inflections. These are the outlines on which all the force and coloring of speech is laid; and these may be justly said to form the first principles of speaking sounds.

Exemplification of the Different Modifications of the Voice. The Monotone, the Rising Inflection, the Falling Inflection, the Rising Circumflex, and the Falling Circumflex.

Though we seldom hear such a variety in reading or speaking as the sense and satisfaction of the ear demand, yet we hardly ever hear a pronunciation perfectly monotonous. In former times, we might have found it in the midnight pronunciation of the Bellman's verses at Christmas; and now the Town Crier, as Shakspeare calls him, sometimes gives us a specimen of the monotonous, in his vociferous exordium — "This is to give notice!" The clerk of a court of justice also promulgates the will of the court by that barbarous metamorphosis of the old French word Oyez! Oyez! Hear ye! Hear ye! into O yes! O yes! In a perfect sameness of voice. But however ridiculous the monotone in speaking may be in the above-mentioned characters, in certain solemn and sublime passages in poetry it has a wonderful propriety, and by the uncommonness of its use, it adds greatly to that variety with which the ear is so much delighted.

This monotone may be defined to be a continuation or sameness of sound upon certain words or syllables, exactly like that produced by repeatedly striking a bell: such a stroke may be louder or softer, but continues in exactly the same pitch. To express this tone, a horizontal line may be adopted; — such a one as is generally used to signify a long syllable in verse. This tone may be very properly introduced in some passages of Akenside's Pleasures of Imagination, where he so finely describes the tales of horror related by the village matron to her infant audience: —

"Breathing astonishment! of witching rhymes
And evil spirits; of the death-bed call
To him who robbed the widow, and devoured
The orphan's portion; of unquiet souls
Risen from the grave to ease the heavy guilt
Of deeds in life concealed; of shapes that walk
At dead of night, and clank their chains, and wave
The torch of hell around the murderer's bed."

If the words "of shapes that walk at dead of night" be pronounced in a monotone, it will add wonderfully to the variety and solemnity of the passage.

The rising inflection is that upward turn of the voice we generally use at the comma, or in asking a question beginning with a verb; as, "Nó, say you? did he say Né?" This is commonly called a suspension of voice, and may not properly be marked by the acute accent, thus (´).

The falling inflection is generally used at the semicolon and colon, and must necessarily be heard in answer to the former question: "He did: he said Nó." This inflection, in a lower tone of voice, is adopted at the end of almost every sentence, except the definite question, or that which begins with the verb. To express this inflection, the grave accent seems adapted, thus (˘).

The rising circumflex begins with the falling inflection, and ends with the rising upon the same syllable, and seems, as it were, to twist the voice upwards. This inflection may be exemplified by the drawing tone we give to some words spoken ironically; as the word Clodius, in Cicero's Oration for Milo. This turn of voice may be marked in this manner (ˆ): —

"But it is foolish in us to compare Drusus Africanus and ourselves with Clódius; all our other calamities were tolerable, but no one can patiently bear the death of Clódius."

The falling circumflex begins with the rising inflection, and ends with the falling upon the same syllable, and seems to twist the voice downwards. This inflection seems generally to be used in ironical reproach; as on the word pat, in the following example: —

"So, then, you are the author of this conspiracy against me? It is to you that I am indebted for all the mischief that has befallen me?"

If to these inflections we add the distinction of a phrase into accentual portions, as,

"Prosperity | gains friends | and adversity | tries them," | and pronounce friends like an unaccented syllable of game, and like an unaccented syllable of adversity, and then like an unaccented syllable of tries, we have a clear idea of the relative forces of all the syllables, and approximate closely to a notation of speaking sounds.

OBSERVATIONS

GREEK AND LATIN ACCENT, &c.

1. In order to form an idea of the Accent and Quantity of the dead languages, it will be necessary first to understand what we mean by the accent and quantity of our own language: * and as quantity is supposed by some to regulate the accent in English as well as in Greek and Latin, it will be necessary first to inquire what we mean by long and short vowels, or, as some are pleased to term them, syllables.

2. In English, then, we have no conception of quantity arising from any thing but the nature of the vowels, as they are pronounced long or short. Whatever retardation of voice in the sound of a vowel there might be in Greek or Latin before two consonants, and those often twin consonants, we find every vowel in this situation as easily pronounced short as long; and the quantity is found to arise from the length or shortness we give to the vowel, and not from any obstruction of sound occasioned by the succeeding consonants. Thus the a in banish, banner, and baxter, is short in all these words, and long in paper, taper, and vapor; the i long in misery, minor, and mitre, and short in misery, middle, and mistris; and so of the rest of the vowels; and though the accent is on the first syllable of all these words, we see it perfectly compatible with either long or short quantity.

3. As a further proof of this, we may observe, that unac-cented vowels are frequently pronounced long, when the accented vowels are short. Thus the e in Cicero, in English as well as in Latin pronunciation, is long, though unaccented; and the i short, though under the accent. The same may be observed of the name of our English poet Lillo. So in our English words conclave, reconcile, chamomile, and the substantives confine, perfume, and a thousand others, we see the first accented syllable short, and the final unaccented syllable long. Let those who contend that the acute accent and long quantity are inseparable, call the first vowels of these words long, if they please; but by those who make their ear, and not their eye, the judge of quantity, when compared with the last vowels, they will always be esteemed short. †

4. The next object of inquiry is, What is the nature of English accent? Mr. Sheridan, ‡ with his usual decision, tells us, that accent is only a greater force upon one syllable than another, without any relation to the elevation or depression of the voice; while almost every other writer on the subject makes the elevation or depression of the voice inseparable from accent. When words are pronounced in a monotone, as the bellman repeats his verses, the crier pronounces his advertisement, or the clerk of a church gives out the psalm, we hear an ictus or accidental force upon the

* It is not surprising that the accent and quantity of the ancients should be so obscure and mysterious, when two such learned men of our own nation as Mr. Forster and Dr. Gally differ about the very existence of quantity in our own language. The former of these gentlemen maintains, that "the English have both accent and quantity, and that no language can be without them;" but the latter asserts, that "in the modern languages, the pronunciation doth not depend upon a natural quantity, and therefore a greater liberty may be allowed in the placing of accents." And in another place, speaking of the northern languages of Europe, he says, that "it was made impossible to think of establishing quantity for a foundation of harmony, in pronunciation. Hence it became necessary to lay aside the consideration of quantity, and to have recourse to accents." "In these and some other passages, that writer," says Forster, "seems to look upon accents as alone regulating the pronunciation of English, and quantity as excluded from it." — Forster's Essay on Accent and Quantity, p. 28.

As a further proof of the total want of ear in a great Greek scholar, Lord Monboddo says, "Our accents differ from the Greek in two material respects; first, they are not appropriated to particular syllables of the word, but are laid upon different syllables, according to the fancy of the speaker, or rather as it happens; for I believe no man speaking English does, by choice, give an accent to one syllable of a word different from that which he gives to another."

"Two things, therefore, that, in my opinion, constitute our verse, are the number of syllables, and the mixture of loud and soft, according to certain rules. As to quantity, it is certainly not essential to our verse, and far less is accent." — See Steele's Prooemia Rationalis, p. 103, 110.

† A late very learned and ingenious writer tells us that our accent and quantity always coincide, he objects to himself the words signify, magnify, qualify, &c., where the final syllable is longer than the accented syllable; but this, he asserts, with the greatest probability, was not the accentuation of our ancestors, who placed the accent on the last syllable, which is naturally the longest. But this sufficiently proves that the accent does not necessarily lengthen the syllable it falls on; that is, if length consist in pronouncing the vowel long, which is the natural idea of long quantity, and not in the duration of the voice upon a short vowel occasioned by the retardation of sounding two succeeding consonants, which is an idea, though sanctioned by antiquity, that has no foundation in nature; for who, that is not prejudiced by early opinion, can suppose the first syllable of elbow to be long, and the last short? — See Essay on Greek and Latin Prosodies, printed for Robson.

‡ The term (accent) with us has no reference to inflections of the voice or musical notes, but only means a peculiar manner of distinguishing one syllable of a word from the rest. — Lectures on Elocution, quarto edition, p. 41.

"To illustrate the difference between the accent of the ancients and that of ours," says Mr. Sheridan, "let us suppose the same movements beat upon the drum, and sounded by the trumpet. Take, for instance, a succession of words where the accent is on every second syllable, which forms an iambic movement; the only way by which a drum (as it is incapable of any change of notes) can mark that movement, is by striking a soft note first, followed by one more forcible, and so in succession. Let the same movement be sounded by the trumpet, in an alternation of high and low notes, and it will give a distinct idea of the difference between the English accents and those of the ancients." — Art of Reading, p. 75.

I am sorry to find one of the most ingenious, learned, and candid inquirers into this subject of the same opinion as Mr. Sheridan. The authority of Mr. Nares would have gone near to shake my own opinion, if I had not recollected that this gentleman confesses he cannot perceive the least of a diphthongal sound in the i in strike, which Dr. Wallis, he observes, excludes from the simple sounds of the vowels. For if the definition of a vowel sound be, that it is formed by one position of the organs, nothing can be more perceptible than the double position of them in the present case, and that the noun eye, which is perfectly equivalent to the pronoun I, begins with the sound of a in father, and ends in that of e in equal. — See Nares's English Orthoëpy, pp. 2, 144.

several accented syllables, which distinguishes them from the others, but no more variety of tone than if we were to beat the syllables of the same words upon a drum, which may be louder or softer, but cannot be either higher or lower. This is pronouncing according to Mr. Sheridan's definition of accent; and this pronunciation certainly comes under the definition of singing; — It is singing ill, indeed, as Julius Cæsar said of a bad reader, but still it is singing, and therefore essentially different from speaking; for in speaking, the voice is continually sliding upwards or downwards, and in singing, it is leaping, as it were, from a lower to a higher, or from a higher to a lower note, — the only two possible ways of varying the human voice, with respect to elevation or depression; — so that when we are told by some writers on this subject, that the speaking of the ancients was a kind of singing, we are led into the error of supposing that singing and speaking differ only in degree, and not in kind, whereas they are just as different as motion and rest.*

5. Whenever, in speaking, we adopt a singing tone, (which was formerly the case with Puritan preachers,) it differs essentially from speaking, and can be pricked down upon paper, and be played upon a violin; and whenever, in singing, we adopt a speaking tone, the slide of this tone is so essentially distinct from singing, as to shock the ear like the harshest discord. Those, therefore, who rank recitatives as a medium between singing and speaking, are utterly ignorant of the nature of both. Recitative is just as much singing as what is called air, or any other species of musical composition.

6. If we may have recourse to the eye, the most distinct and definite of all our senses, we may define musical notes to be horizontal lines, and speaking tones oblique lines; the one rises from low to high, or falls from high to low, by distinct intervals, as the following straight lines to the eye; — — — the other slides upwards or downwards, as the following oblique lines:  nor is the one more different to the eye than the other is to the ear. Those, therefore, who gravely tell us that the enunciation of the ancients was a kind of musical speaking, impose upon us with words to which we can annex no ideas; and when they attempt to illustrate this musico-speaking

* It is not denied, that the slides in speaking may sometimes leap, as it were, from a low to a high, or from a high to a low note; that is, that there may be a very considerable interval between the end of one of those slides and the beginning of another; as between the high note in the word no, in the question, Did he say No? and the low note which the same word may adopt in the answer, No, he did not. But the sound which composes the note of speaking, as it may be called, and the sound which composes the note of singing, are essentially distinct; the former is in continual motion, while the latter is for a given time at rest. — See Note to sect. 23.

† How the ancients could make every monosyllable accented, (that is, according to their definition of accent, pronounced with an elevated tone of voice,) without telling us how this elevation happened, whether it were the elevation of one part of the syllable above the other, or the elevation of one word or syllable above other words or syllables, — how these distinctions, I say, so absolutely necessary to a precise idea of accent, should never be once mentioned, can be resolved into nothing but that attachment to words without ideas, and that neglect of experiment, which have involved the moderns in the same mist of ignorance and error.

‡ That excellent scholar, Mr. Forster, furnishes an additional instance of the possibility of uniting a deep and accurate knowledge of what is called the prosody of the ancients, with a total ignorance of the accent and quantity of his own language. After a thousand examples to show how the English is susceptible of every kind of metre among the ancients, (though in all his examples he substitutes English accent for Greek and Latin quantity,) he proceeds to show the difference between the English, the Irish, and the Scotch pronunciation.

“The English join the acute and long time together, as in liberty, y short. The Scotch observe our quantity, and alter our accent, liberty, y short. When I say they observe our quantity, I mean they pronounce the same syllable long which we do, but they make it longer. In respect to the circumflex with which their pronunciation abounds, it may be remarked, that it is not formed as the Greek, Latin, and English, of an acute and grave, but of a grave and acute: oóç, rós, róund, English; róund, Scotch.

“The Irish observe our quantity and accent too, but with a greater degree of spirit or emphasis, which Scaliger calls affectio in latitudine, giving to most syllables an aspiration.” — Essay on Accent and Quantity, p. 75.

pronunciation by referring us to the Scotch and other dialects, they give us a rhetorical flourish instead of a real example; for however the Scotch and other speakers may draw out the accent, and give the vowel a greater length than the English, it is always in an oblique, and not in a straight line; for the moment the straight line of sound, or the monotone is adopted, we hear something essentially distinct from speaking.

7. As high and low, loud and soft, forcible and feeble, are comparative terms, words of one syllable pronounced alone, and without relation to other words or syllables, cannot be said to have any accent. † The only distinction to which such words are liable, is an elevation or depression of voice, when we compare the beginning with the end of the word or syllable. Thus a monosyllable, considered singly, rises from a lower to a higher tone in the question No? which may, therefore, be called the acute accent; and falls from a higher to a lower tone, upon the same word, in the answer No, which may, therefore, be called the grave. But when the accented word or syllable is associated with unaccented words or syllables, the acute accent is louder and higher than the preceding, and the grave accent is louder and higher than the succeeding syllables, as in the question, Satisfactorily, did he say? and the grave accent both louder and higher than either the preceding or succeeding syllables, in the answer, He said satisfactorily. Those who wish to see this explained more at large may consult Elements of Elocution, page 183, or Rhetorical Grammar, 3d edition, p. 77.

8. This idea of accent is so evident, upon experiment, as to defy contradiction; and yet, such is the general ignorance of the modifications of the voice, that we find those who pretend to explain the nature of accent the most accurately, when they give us an example of the accent in any particular word, suppose it always pronounced affirmatively and alone; ‡ that is, as if words were always pronounced with one inflection of voice, and as if there were no difference with respect to the nature of the accent, whether the word is an affirmation or a question, in one part of the sentence or in another; when nothing can be more palpable, to a correct ear, than that the accents of the word volsuntary, in the following sentences, are essentially different: —

His resignation was volsuntary.

He made a volsuntary resignation.

In both, the accent is on the first syllable. In the first sentence, the accented syllable is higher and louder than the

Mr. Forster falls exactly into the mistake of Mr. Sheridan, though he has a quite different idea of accent. He supposes liberty always pronounced by an Englishman in one manner, and that as a single word, or at the end of a sentence; he has not the least notion of the different inflections the same word may have, accordingly as the accent is differently inflected, as we may plainly perceive in the following question: “Is it liberty or licentiousness you please, say?” where the English raises the voice on the first syllable, as the Scotch too frequently do. With respect to the quantity of the first syllable, which Mr. Forster says the Scotch preserve in this word, I must dissent from him totally; for they preserve the accent, and alter the quantity, by pronouncing the first syllable as if written liberty. If Mr. Forster call this syllable long in the English pronunciation of it, I should be glad to be told of a shorter accented syllable than the first of liberty; if he say the accent being on it renders it long, I answer, this subverts his whole system; for if accent falling on any vowel make it long, the quantity of the Greek and Latin is overturned, and ome, in the first line of the Æneid, must be a spondee.

This is the consequence of entering on the discussion of a difficult point, without first defining the terms; — nothing but confusion and contradiction can ensue.

But I must give this writer great credit for his saying the Scotch pronunciation abounds with the circumflex; for that is really the case; and the very circumflex opposite to the Greek and Latin, beginning with the grave, and ending with the acute. I am not, however, a little astonished that this did not show him how deficient the ancients were in this modification of the voice; which, though used so frequently in Scotland, is just as much in the human voice as the other circumflex, and may be, and is often, used in England, with the utmost propriety. With respect to the common circumflex on Greek, Latin, and some French words, the accidental use of it is quite unknown, and it only stands for long quantity; but both these circumflexes are demonstrable upon the human voice in speaking, and may be made as evident by experiment as the stress of an accented syllable, by pronouncing the word on which it is placed. — See Rhetorical Grammar, 3d edit. p. 80.

I must just take notice of the inaccuracy of Mr. Forster, in saying the last syllable of liberty is short, and yet that it has the circumflex accent: this is contrary to all the prosody of antiquity, and contrary to the truth of the case in this instance; for it is the length of the first syllable, arising from the circumflex on it, which distinguishes the Scotch from the English pronunciation.

other syllables; and in the second, it is louder and lower than the rest. The same may be observed of the following reason: — where the first syllable of the word voluntary is louder and lower than the succeeding syllables; and in the word involuntary it is louder and higher. Those who have not ears sufficiently delicate to discern this difference, ought never to open their lips about the acute or grave accent, as they are pleased to call them; let them speak of accent, as it relates to stress only, and not to elevation or depression of voice, and then they may speak intelligibly.

9. A want of this discernment has betrayed Mr. Forster into obscurity and contradiction. To say nothing of his asserting that the English, Irish, and Scotch accents differ, (where accent cannot possibly mean stress, for then English verses would not be verse in Ireland and Scotland,) what shall we think of his telling us, that in England, we pronounce the word majesty * with an acute accent and long quantity upon the first syllable, and the two last syllables with the grave accent and short quantity; and that in Scotland this word is pronounced with a grave accent and long quantity on the first syllable, and with an acute accent and short quantity on the last? Now, if by accent be meant stress, nothing is more evident than that the English and Scotch, with the exception of very few words, place the accent on the same syllable; but if elevation be included in the idea of accent, it is as evident that the English pronounce the first syllable louder and higher than the two last, when they pronounce the word either singly, or as ending a sentence; as, and louder and lower than the two last, when it is the last accented word but one in a sentence; as,

“He spoke against the king’s majesty ;”

“He spoke against the majesty of the king ;”

or when it is the last word in asking a question, beginning with a verb; as,

“Did he dare to speak against the king’s majesty ?”

10. Where then is the difference, it will be asked, between the English and Scotch pronunciation? I answer, precisely in this, that the Scotch are apt to adopt the rising circumflex and long quantity, where the English use the simple rising inflection and short quantity. Thus in the word majesty, as well as in every other of the same form, they generally adopt the rising inflection, as in the two last sentences, whether it end a question beginning with a verb, as, “Is this the picture of his majesty ?” or whether it end an affirmative sentence, as, “This is the picture of his majesty.” And it is the prevalence of this long quantity with the rising inflection, that forms the principal difference between the English and Scotch pronunciation.

11. Having thus endeavored to ascertain the accent and quantity of our own language, let us next inquire into the nature of the accent and quantity of the ancients.†

12. The long quantity of the ancients must arise either from a prolongation of the sound of the vowel, or from that delay of voice which the pronunciation of two or more consonants in succession are supposed naturally to require. Now, vowels were said to be either long by nature, or long by position. Those long by nature † were such as were long, though succeeded by a single consonant, as the u in uateru, and were a sort of exception to the general rule; for a vowel before a single consonant was commonly short, as in every u in the word tamulus. Those vowels which were long by position were such as were succeeded by two or more consonants, as the first o in sponsor; but if the long and short quantity of the ancients was the same distinction of the sound of the vowel as we make in the words cadence and

magic, calling the first a long, and the second short, then the s in uater and uater ‡ must have been pronounced like our s in later and latter; and those vowels which were long by position, as the e in Beoculus and campus, must have been sounded by the ancients as we hear them in the English words beak and camp.

13. If, therefore, the long quantity of the ancients were no more than a retardation of voice on the consonants, or that duration of sound which an assemblage of consonants is supposed naturally to produce without making any alteration in the sound of the vowel, such long quantity as this an English ear has not the least idea of. Unless the sound of the vowel be altered, we have not any conception of a long or short syllable; and the first syllables of basia, basar, and basar, have, to our ears, exactly the same quantity.

14. But, if the long quantity of the ancients arose naturally from the obstruction the voice meets with in the pronunciation of two or more consonants, how does it happen that the preceding consonants do not lengthen the vowel as much as those which succeed? Dr. Gally tells us the reason of this is, “that the vowel being the most essential part of the syllable, the voice hastens to seize it; and in order to do this, it eludes over all the consonants that are placed before it, so that the voice suffers little or no delay. But the case of the consonant that follows is not the same; it cannot be eluded over, but must be pronounced full and distinct, otherwise it would run into, and be confounded with, the following syllable. By this means the voice is delayed more in the latter than in the former part of the syllable, and u is longer than erpe, and u longer than erpa.”||

I must own myself at a loss to conceive the force of this reasoning. I have always supposed the consonant, when it forms part of a syllable, to be as essential to its sound as the vowel; nor can I conceive why the latter consonants of a syllable may not be pronounced as rapidly as the former, without running the former syllable into the latter, and thus confounding them together; since no such confusion arises when we end the first syllable with the vowel, and begin the following syllable with the consonants; as, pro-crasino, pro-stratus, &c.; as in this case, there is no consonant to stop the first syllable, and prevent its running into the second; so that Dr. Gally seems to have slurred over the matter, rather than to have explained it; but as he is the only writer who has attempted to account for the manner in which quantity is produced by consonants, he is entitled to attention.

15. In the first place, then, in words of more than one syllable, but one consonant can belong to the preceding vowel, as the others must necessarily be considered as belonging to the succeeding vowel, and, according to Dr. Gally, must be hurried over, that the voice may seize its favorite letter. As one consonant, therefore, does not naturally produce long quantity, where is the delay, if the other consonants be hurried over? and, consequently, where is the long quantity which the delay is supposed to produce? This is like adding two nothings together to produce a something.

16. But what does he mean by the necessity there is of pronouncing the latter consonant full and distinct, that it may not run into, and be confounded with, the following syllable? Must not every consonant be pronounced full and distinct, whether we pronounce it rapidly or slowly, whether before or after the vowel? Is not the st in stratus pronounced as full and distinct as the same letters in castra, castrametor, &c.? I know there is a shadow of difference by pronouncing the vowel in our short English manner, so as to unite with the s, as if written cas; but if we make the preceding vowel long, as in casu, and, according to the rules of syllabication laid down by Kamus, Ward, and the Latin grammarians, carry the consonants to the succeeding syllable, as if written cas-stray, we find these consonants pronounced exactly in the same manner; and this

* Would not any one suppose, by Mr. Forster’s producing this word as an example of the English accent, that the English always pronounced it one way, and that as if it ended a declarative sentence? This is exactly like the mistake of Priscian, in the word Natura. — See sect. 90, in the Notes.

† So much are the critics puzzled to reconcile the tragic and comic verses of the ancients to the laws of metre, that a learned writer in the Monthly Review for May, 1769, speaking of the corrections of Dr. Heath, in his notes or readings of the old Greek tragedians, says, —

“These emendations are much more excusable than such as are made merely for the sake of the metre, the rules of which are so extremely vague and various, as they are laid down by the metrical critics, that we will venture to say any chapter in Robinson Crusoe might be reduced to measure by them. This is not conjecture; the thing shall be proved: ‘As I was rummaging about her, { tambicus dimeter hypercatalectus.
I found several { Dochemiaena.
Things that I wanted, { Dactylicus dimeter.
A fire-shovel and tong, { Dochemiaena ex epitrilo quarto et syllab.
Two brass kettles, { Dochemiaena.”

A pot to make chocolate, { Periodus brachycatalectus.
Some horns of fine glazed powder, { Escripidens.
A gridiron, and seven { Dactylicus penthemimeris.
Rat other necessaries, { Basis anapestica cum syllab.”

‡ If the long quantity of the Greek and Latin arose naturally from the retardation of sound occasioned by the succeeding consonants, the long vowels in this situation ought to have been termed long by nature, and those long vowels which come before single consonants should have been called long by custom; since it was nothing but custom made the vowel e in decus (honor) short, and in dado (to give) long; and the vowel e in ovum (an egg) long, and in ovo (to triumph) short.

§ I do not here enter into the question concerning the ancient sound of the Latin a, which I am convinced was like our e in uater; but whether it were like the a in pater, father, or uater, is not of any importance in the present question; the quantity is the same, supposing it to have been any one of them.

|| Dissertation against pronouncing the Greek Language according to Accents, Dissert. ii. p. 50, second edition.

leads us to suppose that double consonants were the signs only, and not the efficient, of long quantity; and that this same long quantity was not simply a duration of sound upon the consonants, but exactly what we call long quantity, — a lengthening of the sound by pronouncing the vowel open, as if we were to pronounce the a long in mater, by sounding it as if written mayer;* and the same letter short in pater, as if it were written pater.*

17. The reason of our repugnance to admit of this analogy of quantity in the learned languages is, that a diametrically opposite analogy has been adopted in the English, and, I believe, in most modern tongues, — an analogy which makes the vowel long before one consonant, and short before more than one.

18. If, however, the quantity of the ancients lay only in the vowel, which was lengthened and shortened in our manner by altering the sound, how strange must have been their poetical language, and how different from the words taken singly! Thus the word sec, which, taken singly, must have been pronounced with the vowel short, like our English word sect, — in composition, as in the line of Virgil, where it is long,

“Fulgura, sec diri totius arserit comete;”

this word must have been pronounced as if written seck: just as differently as the words proper, of, mankind, is, and man, in the line of Pope, would be pronounced by the same rule,

“The proper study of mankind is man;”

and as if written,

“The propeer study ovs mane-kind oes mane.”

When to this alteration of the quantity, by the means of succeeding consonants, we add that rule,

“Finalem cœura brevem producere gaudet;”

which makes the short or doubtful vowel long, that either immediately precedes the cœura, or concludes the hexameter verse, — what must be our astonishment at this very different sound of the words, arising merely from a different collocation of them, and at the strange variety and ambiguity to the ear this difference must occasion! †

19. But if this system of quantity among the ancients appear strange and unaccountable, our wonder will not be diminished when we inquire into the nature of their accent.

20. From what has been said of accent and quantity in our own language, we may conclude them to be essentially distinct and perfectly separable; nor is it to be doubted that they were equally separable in the learned languages; instances of this from the scholastic and commentators are innumerable; but so loose and indefinite are many of their expressions, so little do they seem acquainted with the analysis of the human voice, that a great number of quotations are produced to support the most opposite and contradictory systems. Thus Vossius, Henninius, and Dr. Gally, produce a great number of quotations which seem to confound ac-

* What exceedingly corroborates this idea of quantity is, the common or doubtful vowels, as they are called; that is, such as come before a mute and a liquid; as the first a in patria, the e in refuso, &c.; as in these words the vowel preceding the mute and liquid is either long or short, as the writer or speaker pleases to make it; but if the consonants naturally retarded the sound of the syllable, so as to make it long, how could this be? If the syllable were to be made long, did the speaker dwell longer on the consonants, and if it were to be made short, did he hurry them over? And did this make the difference in the quantity of these syllables? The utter impossibility of conceiving this to have been the case renders it highly probable that the long or short quantity lay only in the vowel.

† See this idea of the different sounds of words, when taken singly, and when in composition, most excellently treated by the author of the Greek and Latin Prosodies, attributed to the present bishop of St. Asaph, p. 101.

‡ Is it not astonishing that learned men will wrangle with each other for whole pages about the sense of a word in Dionysius of Halicarnassus, upon the difference between singing and speaking sounds, when this difference is just as open to them, by experiment, as it was to him? Who can sufficiently admire the evagance of Isaac Vossius, who says, — “In cantu latius evagari sonos, quam in recitatione aut communi sermone, utpote in quo vitiosum habetur, si vox ultra disponit, seu tres tonos et semitonum, acuat.” In singing, the sound has a larger compass than in reading or common speaking, inasmuch that, in common discourse, whatever is higher than the disponit is held to be extremely vicious.

§ Thus Priscian: “In unaquaque parte orationis arsis et thesis sunt velut in hac parte natura: ut quando dico natus, elevatur vox et est arsis in ts: quando vero ra, deprimitur vox, et est thesis.” Any one would conclude, from this description of the rising and falling of the voice upon this word, that it could only be pronounced one way, and that cent and quantity, by making the acute accent and long quantity signify the same; while Michaelis, Melancthon, Forster, Primat, and many other men of learning, produce clouds of witnesses from the ancients to prove that accent and quantity are essentially different. † The only thing they seem to agree in is, that the acute accent always raises the syllable on which it is placed higher than any other in the word. § This is certainly true, in English pronunciation, if we pronounce the word singly, and terminate it as if no other were to follow; but if we pronounce it in a sentence, where it is the last accented word but one, or where it is at the end of a question beginning with a verb, when we suspend the voice in expectation of an answer, we then find the latter syllables of the word, though unaccented, are pronounced higher than the accented syllable in the former part of the word. — See No. 7.

21. But what are we to think of their saying that every monosyllable is either accented or circumflexed? If the acute accent signify an elevation of voice, this, with respect to words of one syllable, must mean elevated above every other word either preceding or succeeding, since elevation is a mere comparative word; but this is not once mentioned by them; if it have any meaning, therefore, it must imply that the acute accent is the monosyllable, pronounced with what I should call, the rising inflexion or upward slide; and then we can comprehend how a monosyllable may have the acute accent without reference to any other word; as when we begin a syllable low, and slide it higher, or begin it high, and slide it lower, it may be said to be acute or grave of itself; that is, when it is pronounced alone, and independent of other words. Unless we adopt this definition of the acute and grave, it will be impossible to conceive what the old grammarians mean when they speak of a monosyllable having the grave or the acute accent. Thus Demedes says, on some words changing their accent, — “Si post cum gravi pronuntiatur accentus, erit propositus; si acuto, erit adverbium, ut longe post tempore veni.”

22. It was a canon, in the prosody of the Greeks and Romans, that words of more than one syllable must have either an acute or a circumflex accent; and that the other syllables, without an accent, were to be accounted grave; but if this be so, what are we to think of those numerous monosyllables, and the final syllables of those dissyllables, that we may see marked with the grave accent, as, Mis, ros, cris, Θεός, Ἄστρο, &c. &c. ? “Why, these words,” says Mr Forster, “whatever Dr. Gally may conceive, had certainly their elevation on the last syllable;” and this opinion of Mr. Forster is supported by some of the most respectable authorities. †

23. With respect to the power of the accent in both the Greek and Latin languages, nothing can be better established by the ancient grammarians, than that the acute accent did not lengthen the syllable it fell upon, and that short syllables, remaining short, had often the acute accent. This opinion has been irrefutably maintained by Mr. Forster, and the author of “Observations on the Greek and there was no difference in the comparative height of the vowel u, in the two following sentences: —

“Lucretius wrote a book De Rerum Natura.”

“Lucretius wrote a book De Natura Rerum.”

Whereas it is evident that the word natura is susceptible of two different pronunciations: in the first sentence the syllable tu is louder and higher than the last; and in the second it is louder and lower than the last; and this confounding of loud with high, and soft with low, seems to be the great stumbling-block both of ancients and moderns. — See No. 7, 8, &c.

‡ “Ea vero, quæ sunt syllabæ unius, erunt acutæ aut flexæ; ne sit aliqua vox sine acutâ.” Quæz. lib. 1. c. 5.

† The seeming impossibility of reconciling accent and quantity made Herman Vanderhaert, the author of a small treatise entitled Arænam Accentuum Græcorum, consider the marks of Greek accentuation as referring not to syllabic, but oratorical, accent. But, as Mr. Forster observes, “If this supposition were true, we should not meet with the same word constantly accented in the same manner as we see it at present. A word’s oratorical accent will vary according to the general sentiment of the passage wherein it occurs; but its syllabic accent will be invariably the same, independent of its connection with other words in the same sentence, except in the case of enclitics and a few others.” — Essay on Accent and Quantity, p. 25.

 But when Mr. Forster endeavors to explain how this is to be done, he has recourse to music: —

“Notwithstanding the reluctance of Vossius, Henninius, and thousands after them, to admit the acute as compatible with a short time, if I could have them near me, with a flute in my hand, or rather with an organ before us, I would engage to convince them of the consistency of these two. I would take any two keys next to each other, one of which would consequently give a sound lower than the other — suppose the word deus before us, or δῆσας; both which words Vossius would circumflex on the penultimate, in-

Latin Prosodies," though as strenuously denied by Dr. Gally,* Isaac Vossius, and Henningius; and these last seem to have been persuaded of the inseparable concomitancy of the acute accent and long quantity, from the impossibility they supposed there was of separating them in any language. But if we make our ears, and not our eyes, judges of quantity, can any thing be more palpable than the short quantity of the accented syllables of próselyte, ánodyne, tríbune, and ísmate, and the long quantity of the final syllables of these words? And when we pronounce the Greek and Latin words, εφάλλω, falló, ἐμφο, empho, nothing can be more evident than the long quantity of the final vowel, though without the accent, and the short quantity of the initial and accented syllable.

24. As to the long quantity arising from the succession of two consonants, which the ancients are uniform in asserting, if it did not mean that the preceding vowel was to lengthen its sound, as we should do by pronouncing the s in scatter as we do in skater, (one who skates,) I have no conception of what it meant; † for if it meant that only the time of the syllable was prolonged, the vowel retaining the same sound, I must confess as utter an inability of comprehending this source of quantity in the Greek and Latin as in English. Baniak, bansker, and baxter, have, to our ears, the first syllable equally short; the same may be observed of senate, seninary, sentence, and sentiment; and if, as an ingenious critic ‡ has asserted, the ancients pronounced both the consonants in callidus, falló, &c., — that is, finishing one l, by separating the tongue from the palate, before the other is begun, — such a pronunciation must necessarily augment the number of syllables, nearly as if written caloidus, falolo, &c., and is therefore contrary to all the rules of ancient prosody; nor would this pronunciation to our ears give the least length to the preceding vowel, any more than the succeeding mute does in sentence and sentiment.

25. When these observations on the accent and quantity of the ancients are all put together, shall we wonder that the learned and ingenious author of "Elements of Criticism" § should go so far as to assert that the dactyls and spondees of hexameter verse, with respect to pronunciation, are merely ideal, not only with us, but that they were so with the ancients themselves? Few, however, will adopt an opinion which will necessarily imply that the Greek and Latin critics were utterly ignorant of the nature of their own language; and every admirer of those excellent writers will rather embrace any explanation of accent and quantity, than give up Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Cicero, Quintilian, and Longinus. Suppose then, as a last refuge, we were to try to read a Greek or Latin verse, both by accent stead of giving an acute to the first, according to our present marks; I would, conformably to these marks, just touch the higher key for the initial á, and take my finger off immediately; and then touch the lower key, on which I would dwell longer than I did on the higher, and that would give me a grave with a long time for the syllable á; the same lower key I would just touch again, and instantly leave it, which would give me a grave with a short time for de: acúte. Now, if this can be done on a wind instrument, within the narrow compass of two notes, it may be done by the organs of human speech, which are of the nature of a wind instrument, in ordinary pronunciation. For the sounds of our voice, in common speech, differ from those of such musical instruments, not in quality, but in arithmetical discrete quantity or number only, as hath been observed before, and is confirmed by the decisive judgment of that nice and discerning critic, Dionysius of Halicarnassus. Here then is, to demonstration, an acute tone consistent with a short time, and a grave tone with a long one." pp. 342, 343. To this I may add the observation made by the author of the "Essay on the Harmony of Language;" "Strange it seems, that the author of this passage should maintain an opinion so contrary to truth, so repugnant to his own purpose, so belied by daily and hourly experience, as that the union of the acute tone with a short quantity seldom occurs in English pronunciation, and is hardly practiced by an English voice." And still more strange, I may add, is it, that these two authors should not see that the experiment, which is called a demonstration, has nothing to do with the point in question. It regards tones that rise or fall by perceptible intervals, and not such as rise or fall by slides or imperceptible ones. Let it once be allowed that the Greeks and Romans sung their language, instead of speaking it, and then the acute or grave accent, with long or short quantity, is easily conceived; but it is not about musical, but speaking tones that we inquire; and though the authority of Dionysius of Halicarnassus is cited for the nature of the speaking voice, as distinct, in degree only, and not in kind, from singing, I boldly assert that this is not matter of authority, but of experiment, and that singing and speaking are as distinct as motion and rest. It is true, some motion may be so slow as not to be perceived; but then it is to be considered as rest; as a curve may approach so near to a right line as not to be distinguishable from it; but in these and quantity, in the manner they have prescribed, and see what such a trial will produce.

26. By quantity, let us suppose the vowel lengthened to express the long quantity; and by the acute accent, the rising inflection, as explained above.

Τίτυρ, τὰ πάλυε ρέκυβανε σὺβ τέρμινε φάγι,
Συβέστρεμ τένυι μῦσᾶμ μεδίτᾶρῖν ἀβένᾶ.

Τίτυρ, τὰ πάλυῖ ρέκυβᾶνε σὺβ τέρμινε φάγι,

Ow-lom-mén-en hec moo-re a-kay-óts áil-ge éth-é-é-keo.

27. Now there are but four possible ways of pronouncing these verses without going into a perfect song; ‖ one is, to pronounce the accented syllable with the falling inflection, and the unaccented syllable with the same inflection in a lower tone, which is the way we pronounce our own words when we give them the accent with the falling inflection; the second is, to pronounce the accented syllable with the rising inflection, and the unaccented syllables with the same inflection in a lower tone, which we never hear in our own language; the third is, to pronounce the accented syllable with the falling inflection, and the unaccented syllables with the rising, in a lower tone; and the fourth, to pronounce the accented syllable with the rising inflection, and the unaccented with the falling, in a lower tone. None of these modes but the first and last do we ever hear in our own language; the second and third seem too difficult to permit us to suppose that they could be the natural current of the human voice in any language. The first leaves us no possible means of explaining the circumflex; but the last, by doing this, gives us the strongest reason to suppose that the Greek and Latin acute accent was the rising inflection, and the grave accent the falling inflection, in a lower tone.

28. But if the reader were sufficiently acquainted with these inflections of voice, or could be present while I exemplified them to him, I doubt not that he would immediately say it was impossible so monotonous a pronunciation cases, where the senses, and not the understanding, are addressed, things are to be estimated for just what the senses value them at. De non apparentibus, et de non existentibus, eadem est ratio.

* If the acute accent, or stress, as Dr. Gally calls it, made the short syllable long, what becomes of the metre of verse? How will he scan "Arma virumque cano"?

† If the double consonants naturally made a syllable long, I should be glad to know how there could be exceptions to this rule. How could Ammonius say that the second syllable of καταμα was long, when the word was used in one particular sense, and short in another? And how could Cicero say that the first letter of ιαχτύλος was short, and the first of ισακσος and ιψίλις long, if two succeeding consonants naturally lengthened the syllable? Dr. Forster, indeed, attempts to reconcile this contradiction, by observing that Cicero does not say the first syllable of ιαχτύλος is short, but the first letter; but it may be demanded, What is it that makes the syllable long or short, but the length or shortness of the vowel? If the double consonants necessarily retard the sound of the vowel, the second syllable of καταμα, and the first of ιαχτύλος, could not possibly be pronounced short; and particularly the latter word could not be so pronounced, as it has the accent on the first syllable. See sect. 16, in the Note.

‡ "Essay upon the Harmony of Language," pp. 226, 233: Robson, 1774.

§ "Elements of Criticism," vol. ii. p. 106. See, also, the "Essay upon the Harmony of Language," p. 234.

‖ This, I may be bold to say, is coming to the point at once, without hiding our ignorance, by supposing that the ancients had some mysterious way of pronouncing, which we are utterly incapable of conceiving. Mr. Sheridan tells us that "the ancients did observe the distinction of accents by an elevation and depression of voice; but the manner in which they did it must remain for ever a secret to us; for with the living tongue perished the tones also, which we in vain endeavor to seek for in their visible marks." — Lectures on Elocution, 4to. edition, p. 39. From these and similar observations in many of our writers, one would be tempted to imagine that the organs of speaking in ancient Greece and Rome were totally different from those of the present race of men in Europe.

could be that of the Greeks and Romans; * but when we consider the monotony of the Scotch, Welsh, and Irish, why should we wonder that other nations should be as monotonous? Let us view the Greek and Latin pronunciation on which side we will, we must, to be consistent with their own rules, feel them to be extremely monotonous. According to the laws of ancient prosody, every unaccented syllable must be lower than that which is accented; and if so, a most disagreeable monotony must necessarily ensue; for, as every word in Latin, and almost every word in Greek, of more than one syllable, ended with the grave accent,—that is, in a lower tone than the preceding syllables,—almost every word in those languages ended with the same tone, let that tone have been what it would.†

§ 29. I am supported in this conjecture, notwithstanding all the fine things† the ancients, and many of the moderns, say of the variety and harmony of the Greek and Latin languages, by the definition which they give of the circumflex accent; which is, that it was a combination of the acute and grave upon the same syllable. This is so incomprehensible to modern ears, that scarcely any one but the author of the present Observations has attempted to explain it by experiment. It stands for nothing but long quantity in all our schools; and, contrary to the clearest testimonies of antiquity, it has, by Dr. Gally,‡ and a late respectable writer on the “Greek and Latin Prosodies,” been explained away into nothing more than the acute accent. But if it means a raising and falling of the voice upon the same syllable, which is the definition the ancients uniformly give of it, it is just as easy to conceive as raising and falling the voice upon successive syllables; or, in other words, as going from a lower tone to a higher upon one syllable, and from a higher to a lower upon the next; and this consideration leads me to conjecture that the acute accent of the ancients was really the rising inflection, or upward slide of the voice; for this being once supposed, nothing is so easy as to demonstrate the circumflex in our own language, which,

* Dr. Burney tells us that Meibomius, the great and learned Meibomius, when prevailed upon, at Stockholm, to sing Greek strophes, set the whole court of Christina in a roar, as Naude did in executing a Roman dance. And Scaliger observes, that if the nice tonical pronunciation of the ancients could be expressed by a modern, it would be disagreeable to our ears.

† This is certainly too general an assertion, if we consider the real pronunciation of the Greek language according to accent; as it must be allowed that a great number of Greek words were accented with the acute or circumflex on the last syllable. But when we consider the modern pronunciation of Greek, which confounds it with the Latin, we shall not have occasion to recall the assertion. To which we may add, that those words in Greek that were circumflexed on the last syllable, may very properly be said to end with the grave accent; and that those which had a grave upon the final syllable altered the grave to an acute only when they were pronounced alone, when they came before an enclitic, or when they were at the end of the sentence.

‡ The Grecian sage, (says Dr. Burney,) according to Gravina, was at once a philosopher, a poet, and a musician. “In separating these characters,” says he, “they have all been weakened; the system of philosophy has been contracted; ideas have failed in poetry, and force and energy in song. Truth no longer subsists among mankind; the philosopher speaks not, at present, through the medium of poetry, nor is poetry heard any more through the vehicle of melody.”—“Now, to my apprehension,” says Dr. Burney, “the reverse of all this is exactly true; for, by being separated, each of these professions receives a degree of cultivation which fortifies and renders it more powerful, if not more illustrious. The music of ancient philosophers, and the philosophy of modern musicians, I take to be pretty equal in excellence.”—History of Music, vol. i. p. 162. Here we see good sense and sound philosophy contrasted with the blind admiration and empty flourish of an overgrown schoolboy concluding his theme.

§ “Dissertation against Greek Accents,” p. 53.

|| To add to our astonishment, that the Greek and Latin languages had but one circumflex, what can be more wonderful than that, among so many of the ancients who have written on the causes of elocution, and who have descended to such trifling and childish observations upon the importance of letters and syllables, we should not find a single author who has taken notice of the importance of emphasis upon a single word? Our modern books of elocution abound with instances of the change produced in the sense of a sentence by changing the place of the emphasis; but no such instance appears among the ancients; not one poor Will you ride to town to-day?

Our wonder will increase, when we consider that the ancients frequently mention the different meaning of a word as it was differently accented; that is, as the acute or circumflex was placed upon one syllable or another; but they never hint that the sense of a sentence is altered by an emphasis being placed upon different words. The ambiguity arising from the same word being differently accented is so happily exemplified by the author of the “Greek and Latin Prosodies,” that I shall use his words: “Alexander Aphrodisiensis illustrates this species of sophism by a well-chosen example of a law in which the sense depends entirely upon the accuracy of accentuation. Ερατρα χροαία ε φοσει δηυβητα τρωα. The word δηυβητα, with the acute accent upon the antepenult, is the neuter nominative plural, in apposition with χροαία. And the sense is, ‘If a courtesan wear golden trinkets, let them’ (viz. her golden trinkets) be forfeited to the public use.’ But if the accent be advanced to the penult, the word, without any other change, becomes the feminine nominative singular, and must be taken in apposition with τρωα. And thus the sense will be, ‘If a courtesan wear golden trinkets, let her become public property.’ This is a very notable instance of the political importance of accents, of written accents, in the Greek language. For if this law had been put in writing, without any accent upon the word δηυβητα, there would have been no means of deciding between two constructions, either of which the words, in this state, would equally have admitted; and it must have remained an inexplicable doubt, whether the legislator meant that the poor women should only forfeit her trinkets, or become a public slave.”

¶ We have the strongest proof in the world, that the ancient Greeks made use only of capital letters, that they were utterly ignorant of punctuation, and that there was not the least space between words or sentences, but that there was an equal continuation of letters, which the reader was obliged to decipher, without any assistance from pauses or distances. Without the clearest evidence, could we suppose that, while composition had reached the perfection it had done in Greece, orthography was in a state of barbarity worthy of the Cape of Good Hope?

Can any thing give us a more ludicrous idea than the practice of the ancients in sometimes splitting a word at the end of the line, and commencing the next line with the latter part of the word? This must have been nearly as ridiculous as the following English verses, in imitation of this absurd practice:—

Pyrrhus, you tempt a danger high,
When you would steal from angry It-
Oness her cubs, and soon shall fly inglorious.

For know the Romans, you shall find
By virtue more and generous kind-Ness, than by force or fortune blind, victorious.

Notwithstanding the hackneyed epithet of Gothic barbarity applied to verse in rhyme, is it not wonderful that a species of versification, approved by Italy, France, and England, in their best periods of poetry, should never once have been tried by the Greeks and Romans?—that they should never have straggled, either by chance or for the sake of change people, who, though remarkably excellent in some things, are surprisingly deficient in others? So true is the observation of Middleton, who, speaking of those who have written on the pronunciation of the Greek and Latin languages, says, "Ab illis verò scriptoribus etiam plurima ingeniosè atque eruditè disputata sint, nonnulla tamen deesse, multa dubiè, quædam etiam falsè posita animadverti; idque hæc in causâ accidisse, quod in cæteris perierique solet, ut mortaliùm nemini detur rem invenisse simul et perfecte."—De Lat. Lit. Prosa.

32. That singing a part in a tragedy should seem so unnatural* to us, arises chiefly from our being so little accustomed to it. Singing in the pulpit seems to the full as extraordinary; and yet this song was so powerful about a century or two ago, and later in Scotland,† as to make mere speaking, though with the utmost energy, appear flat and insipid. Let the human voice be but in a fine tone, and let this tone be intensely impressed, and it will infallibly, as Milton expresses it,

"———take the prisoned soul,
And lap it in Elysium———"

33. What may tend to reconcile us still more to this dramatic music, is the sing-song manner, as it is called, of pronouncing tragedy, which very generally prevailed before the time of Mr. Garrick, and which now prevails among some classes of speakers, and is preferred by them to what we call the more natural manner. This drawing, undulating pronunciation is what the actors generally burlesque by repeating the line,

Tum ti tum ti, tum ti tum ti tum ti;

and though this mode of declamation is now so much de-

into so pleasing a jingle of sounds? They who would write poems, and so lengthen or shorten the lines as to form axes, wings, and altars, might, without any imputation on their taste, have, now and then, descended to rhyme. In short, that the ancients should never have slid into rhyme, is a circumstance which would never have been believed, had it been possible to doubt it; and I fear it must be classed with that long catalogue of unaccountables, with which their prosody, their rhetoric, and their drama, abound.

* Perhaps our unwillingness to believe that the ancient dramas were set to music, arises from a very mistaken notion we have of their skill in that art. It is true we have not the same materials for judging of their music as we have of their poetry and sculpture; but their ignorance of counterpoint, and the poverty of their instruments, sufficiently show what little progress they had made in it. Those very few remains of their music which have reached us, confirm us in this conjecture; and it is to the indefatigable pains of so good a scholar and so excellent a musician as Dr. Burney, that we are indebted for an illustration of it.

"At the end of a Greek edition of the astronomical poet Aratus, called Phænomena," says Dr. Burney, "and their Scholia, published at Oxford in 1762, the anonymous editor, supposed to be Dr. John Fell, among several other pieces, has enriched the volume with three hymns, which he supposed to have been written by a Greek poet called Dionysius; of which the first is addressed to the muse Calliope, the second to Apollo, and the third to Nemesis; and these hymns are accompanied with the notes of ancient music to which they used to be sung.

"I know not whether justice has been done to these melodies; all I can say is, that no pains have been spared to place them in the clearest and most favorable point of view; and yet, with all the advantages of modern notes and modern measures, if I had been told that they came from the Cherokees or the Hottentots, I should not have been surprised at their excellence.

"I have tried them in every key and in every measure that the feet of the verses would allow; and as it has been the opinion of some that the Greek scale and music should be read Hebrew-wise, I have even inverted the order of the notes, but without being able to augment their grace and elegance. The most charitable supposition that can be admitted concerning them is, that the Greek language, being itself accented and sonorous, wanted less assistance from musical refinements than one that was more harsh and rough; and music being still a slave to poetry, and wholly governed by its feet, derived all its merit and effects from the excellence of the verse, and sweetness of the voice that sung, or rather recited it; for ineffectual and affecting voices nature bestows, from time to time, on some gifted mortals in all the habitable regions of the earth; and even the natural effusions of these must ever have been heard with delight. But, as music, there needs no other proof of the poverty of ancient melody, than its being confined to long and short syllables. We have some airs of the most graceful and pleasing kind, which will suit no arrangement of syllables to be found in any poetical numbers, ancient or modern, and which it is impossible to express, by mere syllables, in any language with which I am at all acquainted."

splend, it is highly probable that it was formerly held in estimation.‡

34. Now, if we suppose this drawing pronunciation, which, though very sonorous, is precisely speaking, and essentially different from singing;—if we suppose this to have been the conversation pronunciation of the Greeks and Romans, it may possibly throw some light upon the manner in which they pronounced by accent and quantity at the same time; for though we can sufficiently conceive that, in common speaking in our own language, we can make the accented syllable short, and the unaccented syllable long, as in the words qualify, specify, elbow, insensé, &c., yet in the drawing pronunciation we have been speaking of, the long unaccented vowels in these words are made much longer, and consequently more perceptible.

35. But if the accent of our language be so different from that of the Greek and Latin, our pronunciation must necessarily be very different likewise. The acute accent of the ancients being always higher than either the preceding or succeeding syllables, and our accent, though always higher than the preceding, being sometimes lower than the succeeding syllables, (see sect. 7.), there must certainly be a wide difference between our pronunciation and theirs. Let us, however, explain the Greek and Latin accent as we will,—let it be by singing, drawing, or common speaking,—it will be impossible to tell how a monotony could be avoided, when almost every word of more than one syllable in these languages, must necessarily have ended in the same tone, or, if you will, with the same grave accent.‡

36. After all, that the Greeks and Romans, in explaining the causes of metrical and prosaic harmony, should sometimes descend to such minute particulars|| as appear to us

Dr. Burney's conjecture, that the Greek music was entirely subservient to verse, accounts for the little attention which was paid to it in a separate state; it accounts for the effects with which their music was accompanied, and for the total uselessness of counterpoint. Simple melody is the fittest music to accompany words, when we wish to understand what is sung: simple melody is the music of the great bulk of mankind; and simple melody is never undervalued till the ear has been sufficiently disciplined to discover the hidden melody, which is still essential to the most complicated and elaborate harmony.

† The Rev. Mr. Whitefield was a highly animated and energetic preacher, without the least tincture of that tone which is called canting. When he went to Scotland, where this tone was in high estimation, though his doctrine was in perfect union with that of his auditors, his simple and natural, though earnest, manner of speaking was looked upon, at first, as a great defect. He wanted, they said, the holy tone.

‡ This cant, which, though disgusting now to all but mere rustics, on account of its being out of fashion, was very probably the favorite modulation in which heroic verses were recited by our ancestors. So fluctuating are the taste and practices of mankind! But whether the power of language have received any advantage from the change just mentioned, (namely, pronouncing words in a more simple manner), will appear at least very doubtful, when we recollect the stories of its former triumphs, and the inherent charms of musical sounds.—The Art of delivering Written Language, p. 73.

§ Where was all that endless variety with which the moderns puff off the Greek language, when it had but one circumflex? The human voice is just as capable of falling and rising upon the same syllable as rising and falling; and why so palpable a combination of sounds as the former should be utterly unknown to the Greeks and Latins, can be resolved into nothing but (horresco referens) their ignorance of the principles of human speech.

|| "Nec illi [Demostheni] turpe videbatur vel optima relicta magistris ad canes se conferre, et ab illis litteram vim et naturam petere, illorumque in sonando, quod satis esset, morem imitari."—Ad. Metaph. de orat. Proo. Pryn. Ling. Græcæ, p. 14.

It is an observation of Chambers, author of the "Cyclopaedia," that nonsense sounds worse in the English than in any other language. Let us try the experiment by translating the above passage:—Nor did Demosthenes think it below him to leave the company of the most respectable people of Athens, and go to the dogs, in order to learn from them the nature of the letter r, and, by observing the sound they gave it, to imitate, as much as was necessary, their manner of pronouncing it.

What encomiums do we meet with in Cicero, on the delicacy of the ears even of the common people of Rome, who, if an actor on the stage made the least error in accent or quantity, were immediately sensible of it, and would express their disapprobation! But I am apt to think that an English actor, who should pronounce theatre, seditior, or conquest, with the accent on the second syllable, would not escape better than the Roman.

trifling and imaginary, and at the same time neglect things which appear to us so essential; that they should be so dark, and sometimes so contradictory, in their account of accent and quantity, as to furnish opposite systems among the moderns, with ample quotations in favor of each;—is this more wonderful than that Mr. Sheridan,* who was so good an actor, and who had spent so much time in studying and writing on elocution, should say that accent was only a louder pronunciation of the accented syllable, and not a higher. But as this same Mr. Sheridan, in his Art of Reading, has excellently observed, that our perception of Latin quantity is imaginary, and arises not from the ear, but only from association, like spelling, so it may be observed, that the confusion and obscurity which reign among all our writers on accent and quantity, seem to arise from an ideal perception of long quantity produced by double consonants; from confounding stress and quantity, which are so totally

* "The Scotchman utters the first syllable of battle, bor-rose, habít, in the middle tone, dwelling on the vowel; and the second with a sudden elevation of the voice, and short; as, bá-tle, bá-u-ró, há-bít. The Englishman utters both syllables without any perceptible change of tone, and in equal time; as, bat'tle, bor'rose, hab'it."—Art of Reading, p. 77. The smallest degree of attention might have taught Mr. Sheridan that, though this is the prevailing, it is not the invariable, pronunciation of a Scotchman; and that this elevation of voice, though more perceptible in a Scotchman, from his drawing out his tones, is no less real in an Englishman, who pronounces them quicker, and uses them less frequently; that is, he mixes the downward inflection with them, which produces a variety. But these two inflections of voice Mr. Sheridan was an utter stranger to.—See Elements of Elocution, part ii. p. 183.

† Nothing is more fallacious than that perception we seem to have of the sound of words being expressive of the ideas, and becoming, as Pope calls it, an echo to the sense. This coincidence, as Dr. Johnson observes in one of his Rambles, seldom exists any where but in the imagination of the reader. Dryden, who often wrote as carelessly as he thought, and often thought as carelessly as he lived, began a commendation of the sweetness and smoothness of two lines of Denham in praise of the Thames—different; and from mistaking loud for high, and soft for low, contrary to the clearest definitions of each.†

37 But till the human voice, which is the same in all ages and nations, be more studied and better understood, and till a notation of speaking sounds be adopted, I despair of conveying my ideas of this subject with sufficient clearness upon paper. I have, however, marked such an outline as may be easily filled up by those who study speaking with half the attention they must do music. From an entire conviction that the ancients had a notation of speaking sounds, and from the actual experience of having formed one myself, I think I can foresee that some future philosophical inquirer, with more learning, more leisure, and more credit with the world, than I have, will be able to unravel this mystery in letters, which has so long been the opprobrium et crux grammaticorum,—the reproach and torment of grammarians.

"Though deep, yet clear, though gentle, yet not dull; Strong without rage, without overflowing full;"

and this commendation of Dryden's has been echoed by all subsequent writers, who have taken it for granted that there is a flow in the lines similar to that of the object described; while the least attention to those stops so necessary on the accented and antithetic words will soon convince us that, however expressive the lines may be, they are as rugged and as little musical as almost any in the language.

A celebrated critic observes, "I am apt to think the harmony of the verse was a secret to Mr. Dryden; since it is evident he was not acquainted with the cæsural stops, by which all numbers are harmonized. Dr. Bentley has observed, the beauty of the second verse consists in the ictus that sounds on the first syllable of the verse, which, in English heroics, should sound on the second; for this verse is derived from the Trimeter Iambic, Brachypœtalectic."—Manswering's Sicology, p. 71.

When I read such profound observations in such learned terms, it brings to my mind the Mock Doctor in the farce, who shines away to the illiterate knight, by repeating Proprie que moribus, &c., and makes him most pathetically exclaim, "O, why did I neglect my studies!"

THE
MODERN GEOGRAPHICAL NAMES.
BY
JOSEPH E. WORCESTER.

PRONUNCIATION OF MODERN GEOGRAPHICAL NAMES.

THE pronunciation of geographical names is a very difficult branch of orthoëpy. These names pertain to all parts of the globe; their vernacular or native pronunciation is regulated or affected by every variety of language; and it would be impossible to represent, in all cases, the native pronunciation by any combination of English letters.

There are a great many names, respecting the pronunciation of which it is difficult to determine how far the English analogy should be allowed to prevail over the analogy of the languages to which the words respectively belong. If we look for authorities for the pronunciation of these names, we find comparatively few; and such authorities as exist embrace but a small part of the words of this class; and there is also much disagreement among orthoëpists with respect to the pronunciation of such of these names as they undertake to pronounce.

With regard to the geographical names which pertain to all the countries in which the English language is spoken, including the British empire in Europe, the United States, and the British provinces generally, their pronunciation is, of course, conformed, for the most part, to the analogy of the English language. In addition to these, all the geographical names which belong to other parts of the globe, but which have become Anglicized by having changed their native form and assumed an English orthography, are also conformed to the general principles of English pronunciation. The most common geographical names, such as those which relate to the great divisions of the globe, the names of the countries, kingdoms, states, principal cities, &c., are differently written, as well as differently pronounced, in different languages. The following table exhibits a few examples of this diversity, by way of illustration:—

English.	French.	German.	Spanish.	Italian.
Asia,	Asie,	Asien,	Asia,	Asia.
Africa,	Afrique,	Afrika,	Africa,	Africa.
Europe,	Europe,	Europa,	Europa,	Europa.
America,	Amérique,	Amerika,	America,	America.
England,	Angleterre,	England,	Inglaterra,	Inghilterra.
Spain,	Espagne,	Spanien,	España,	Spagna.
Germany,	Allemagne,	Deutschland,	Alemania,	Germania.
Italy,	Italie,	Italien,	Italia,	Italia.
Austria,	Autriche,	Oesterreich,	Austria,	Austria.
Sweden,	Suède,	Schweden,	Suecia,	Svezia.
London,	Londres,	London,	Londres,	Londra.
Naples,	Naples,	Napoli,	Napoles,	Napoli.
Leghorn,	Livourne,	Livorno,	Liorna,	Livorno.

There can be no doubt but that geographical names, which assume such different forms in different languages, should be pronounced differently by the inhabitants of different countries, and in accordance with the analogies of their respective languages. All the common geographical names, such as are familiar to all intelligent persons, have become more or less Anglicized, and their pronunciation is more or less conformed to the English analogy. Many of these words may be considered as perfectly Anglicized, and are pronounced as common English words; but there are many that are only partially Anglicized, and with regard to such, it is often difficult to determine how far, in pronouncing them, the English analogy should be allowed to prevail over that of the language to which the words properly belong.

Some foreign geographical names are introduced into the English language without changing their orthography, but are, nevertheless, in their pronunciation, conformed to the English analogy. The word Paris, for example, an Englishman or an Anglo-American, in speaking his own language, would pronounce, in conformity to it, Par'is; though, if he were speaking French, he would pronounce it pär-é, in conformity with the French language.

With respect to the class of words which are partially Anglicized, there is a great diversity in the manner of pronouncing them. Some respectable speakers incline to pronounce them, for the most part, according to the English analogy, while others aspire to pronounce them as they are pronounced in the several languages to which they appertain; and there are many cases in which it is difficult to determine which is most to be approved, the English or the foreign method; but a medium between the two extremes may be regarded generally as a judicious course. A person conversant with foreign languages will be likely to pronounce such words in the foreign manner; while a mere English scholar may be naturally expected and permitted to incline more strongly to the English mode. It may be often desirable to know what the native mode of pronouncing such words is, though it may not be advisable, in common use, to adopt it.

Proper names are more subject to a corrupt pronunciation, or one which is not conformed to the orthography, than common names. A considerable number of the geographical names pertaining to England are pronounced very differently from what their orthography indicates; as, for example, Chertsey and Cirencester, pronounced ches'se and sis'se-ter. Americans are somewhat less inclined to deviate from orthography, in the pronunciation of some words, than the English are. Berwick and Warwick, for example, which are pronounced in England ber'ik and woor'ik, are very often pronounced, in the United States, as they are spelled.

The following Vocabulary was prepared some years since, and annexed to the Comprehensive Dictionary, and to the Elements of Geography, of the author. It has now been somewhat enlarged and improved, by further inquiry, and by the examination of various new authorities, particularly Mr. Baldwin's Universal Pronouncing Gazetteer, a work in which the subject of the pronunciation of geographical names has been attended to with much care and intelligence. Still this Vocabulary, in its present state, is very imperfect. The pronunciation affixed to many of the words may be objected to, as not the most proper. A person much versed in foreign languages will be likely to think that the pronunciation generally has been too much Anglicized; while a mere English scholar will think it is not sufficiently so; and both may doubtless make out a plausible case in favor of their respective views. But, defective as it is, it is hoped that it will not be found a useless appendage to a pronouncing dictionary.

PRINCIPLES

PRONUNCIATION OF SEVERAL EUROPEAN LANGUAGES.

THE following Rules, respecting the pronunciation of certain letters in the principal modern languages of continental Europe, may be of some use in relation to the pronunciation of names pertaining to the several countries where these languages are spoken, though it may be advisable for a mere English scholar to make but a partial application of them in practice.

VOWELS.

A.—The vowel a, in situations in which the analogy of the English language would naturally give it the sound of long a, has, in the languages of the continent of Europe, what is called the Italian sound, that is, the sound of a in far and father. In other situations, its sound approaches nearly to its short English sound, in man, fat.

E.—The sound of the vowel e, at the end of an accented syllable, is the same as that of the English long a, in fate, name. In other situations, it has the sound of the English short e, in met, men.

I.—The long sound of i, in these languages, is the same as in the English word marine, being the same as the English sound of long e in mete, seen. The short sound is the same as its English short sound in pin.

O.—The vowel o has the same sounds that it has in English in the words note, not, and nor.

U.—The vowel u, in most of these languages, has the same sound that it has in English in the word rule, being the same as oo in fool, moon; and when short, it has the sound of u in bull, or of oo in good. The sound of u, in the French language, and also in the Dutch, has no equivalent sound in English; and it can be learned only by oral instruction. It may be regarded as intermediate between the sound of long e and oo, partaking of both.

Y.—The vowel y has, in most of these languages, the same sound as i, that is, of long e, as in me; but in the Dutch language, it has the sound of the English long i, in pine.

DIPHTHONGS.

AE or Æ.—The sound of the diphthong æ, in Dutch, is like the English sound of a in far; in German, a or ä like that of the English a, in fate.

AI.—The sound of the diphthong ai, in French, is like that of the English long a, in fate; in Italian, Spanish, and Portuguese, like that of the English long i, in pine.

AU and EAU.—The diphthong au, and the triphthong eau, in French, have the sound of the English long o, in note; as, Chaumont, (shò-mông'), Beauvais, (bò-vá'). In German, Italian, Spanish, and Portuguese, the diphthong au has the English sound of ow in now; as, Austerlitz, (òs'ter-lts.) The German diphthongs au and eu have a sound like that of the English diphthong oi, in toil; as, Neustadt, (nò'stät.)

EI and EY.—The diphthongs ei and ey, in German, have a sound similar to the English sound of long i, in pine; as, Leipzig.

EU.—The French diphthong eu has a sound similar to that of the English sound of e in her, or u in fur.

IE.—The diphthong ie, in French, German, Dutch, &c., has the sound of the English long e, in mete; as, Wesland.

UE or Ü.—The sound of the German diphthong ue or ü is like that of the French u.

OU.—The French diphthong ou has the sound of the English oo, in tool; as, Tou-luse, (tò-lòz')

OE or Ö.—The sound of the German diphthong oe or ö resembles that of the French eu; but it has no equivalent sound in English, and is not easily explained. It may be conceived, in the name of Goethe, or Göthe, thus represented, (guët'te,) pronounced in two syllables, the sounds of u and of e in her, in the first syllable, being blended together.

CONSONANTS.

The sounds of most of the consonants, in the continental languages, are the same as in English. Some of the principal exceptions are the following:—

B.—The sound of b, in German, at the end of a word, is like that of the English p;—in Spanish, between two vowels, similar to v.

C.—The sound of c, in German, before e, i, and y, is like that of ts in English;—in Italian, before e and i, like that of ch in the English word chill;—in Spanish, before e and i, like that of th in this.

D.—The sound of d, in German and Dutch, at the end of a word, is like that of t in English;—in Danish and Spanish, between two vowels or at the end of a syllable, like that of th in this.

G.—The sound of g, in French, before i, e, and y, is like that of zh in English;—in Spanish, before e and i, the same as the Spanish j;—in Italian, before e and i, like that of g in the English word gem, or j in jet;—in German, at the beginning of words, it is hard, like g in get; and in words ending in gem, it is thrown back on the penultimate syllable; as, Hecking-en.

J.—The sound of j, in French and Portuguese, is like that of zh in English;—in Spanish, it is like that of h strongly aspirated;—in the other languages, like that of y consonant.

X.—The sound of x, in Spanish, is like that of h strongly aspirated, being the same as that of the Spanish j, and also of g before e and i.

Z.—The sound of z, in German and Swedish, is like that of ts in English;—in Italian, like dz; zz, in Italian, like ts.

CH.—The sound of the digraph ch, in French and Portuguese, is the same as the English sh, or of ch in chaise;—in Spanish, the same as ch in the English word chill;—in Italian, (as in words from the ancient languages, Hebrew, Greek, and Latin,) like that of k.—In German and Dutch, it has a hard, guttural sound, not easily represented in English, but resembling that of h strongly aspirated. It is represented in this Vocabulary, as it is in others, by the letter k.

TH.—The digraph th, in these several languages, has the sound of t; as, This, (tis.)
